STANDARD INDUSTRIAL CLASSIFICATION OF ECONOMIC ACTIVITIES
Correlation between SIC(92) and SIC(80)

Introduction

1. A new Standard Industrial Classification of economic activities [SIC(92)] was issued in November 1992. It is published by HMSO (ISBN 0 11 620550 4 - price £18). It replaces the Standard Industrial Classification revised and issued in 1980 [SIC(80)]. A companion index volume to SIC(92) was published on 23 July 1993 (HMSO: ISBN 0 11 620551 2 - price £17.50).

Classification changes

2. Until SIC(92) was introduced the SIC(80) had been used largely unchanged since it was introduced. Revision was necessary because, over a period of time, new products and the new industries to produce them emerge and shifts of emphasis occur in existing industries, so that after a period of time updating the classification is the most sensible action. SIC(92), however, was not produced by updating SIC(80) but was derived from the European communities' classification of economic activities (NACE Rev 1) which was introduced under EC regulation in 1990. It was not possible, therefore, to simply extend or amend the SIC(80) codes because under the regulation it was obligatory to follow the NACE Rev 1 code structure. To ensure easy comparability at the European level the UK chose to adopt the four digit NACE Rev 1 structure and codes completely.

Change from 1980 Classification

3. The most immediate change from SIC(80) is that the numbering system is different. SIC(92) is still a five digit classification but the actual codes will not necessarily refer to the same activities.

4. In addition to the change in the numbering system, there are also some changes in the sequence in which different industries are listed. For example, energy and water supply industries near the start of SIC(80) have been split and moved into fuel extraction, mining and quarrying; fuel processing and production; and energy production and distribution. The most marked change is the increase in headings in the services sector where for example "other services" splits principally between eight of the new section headings. Another type of change is that retail outlets are now classified by type and not mainly by goods sold, as in SIC(80).

5. Also the names of the hierarchical levels of the SIC have now been brought into line with international classifications, so that the two digit level is the division, the three digit is the group and the four digit level is the class. The UK has termed the five digit level the subclass.

Correlation

6. Some codes are directly comparable between SIC(80) and SIC(92) and can be shown as a one to one match. In other cases though, codes have been split or amalgamated so that it is necessary to show a number of partial correlations.

7. Two tables showing the relationship between the 1980 classification and the present revision are presented in this document. The tables cover all activities where either the SIC(80) or the SIC(92) classification have been considered but it is possible that there may be some activities that should be noted as additional partial correlations, that have not been considered. However, what needs to be stressed is that it is not possible to automatically re-code from one classification where activities previously covered by one code are now covered by more than one new code.

8. The main Table I shows the SIC(92) classes or subclasses and the SIC(80) activity headings which covered the activities now included in each SIC(92) class or subclass. Where only a part (p) of an activity heading correlates, then the remarks give some indication of the part concerned. The correlations are shown at the lowest level available. Higher level correlations can be achieved by looking only at the two, three or four digits of the codes shown in the table. For convenience the table is divided at the SIC(92) division levels.

9. A supplementary Table II shows the same SIC(92) codes and their related SIC(80) codes but sorted into SIC(80) order so that it is possible to see directly where activities covered by a single SIC(80) activity heading can be found in SIC(92).

International correlations

10. SIC(92) is directly drawn from the European classification of economic activities (NACE Rev 1) so that the first four digits of SIC(92) are exactly the same as NACE Rev 1. However, NACE Rev 1, and so SIC(92), is an extension of the United Nations International Standard Industrial Classification of economic activities (ISIC Rev 3). Only the first two digits (the divisions) of ISIC Rev 3, NACE Rev 1 and SIC(92) are exactly the same. However, the three and four digit levels (the groups and classes) of NACE Rev 1 and SIC(92) are exact breakdowns of related levels in ISIC Rev 3. Annex A shows the match between the ISIC Rev 3 codes and the SIC(92) codes.

Conclusion

11. It is not possible to quantify the changes between the two SICs because that will depend entirely on the data being collected. It may, however, be possible, by reference to these tables, to make some adjustment to ignore certain correlations where a partial correlation appears to relate to only a small part of an activity in comparison to the main correlation.

12. Any comments on, corrections to or questions about these tables should be addressed to the Central Statistical Office.
