The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies is a great association of men and women banded together for the single purpose of obtaining the Parliamentary vote for women on the same terms as it is or may be granted to men. It was founded in 1867, and now numbers over 52,000 annually-subscribing members, organized into 483 Societies, under the presidentship of Mrs. Henry Fawcett. The colours of the Union are SCARLET, WHITE, and GREEN. Among its members are people of all parties, and people of none. The cause that unites them is the cause of Women's Suffrage, and they work for victory by peaceful methods only. They utterly repudiate methods of violence and rely on political pressure and the education of public opinion, WILL YOU JOIN? (Membership form on p. 136.)

Notes and Comments.

Woman Suffrage in the Scottish Home Rule Bill.

The Scottish Liberal members have re-inserted in the Scottish Home Rule Bill a clause for the enfranchisement of This clause is based upon the occupiership qualification, following the lines of Mr. Dickinson's Bill. It will be remembered that the Welsh Home Rule Bill, introduced over a nonth ago by Mr. John, had a clause to give votes to women on he same terms as might be determined for men. Suffragists follow the debate on the Scottish Bill with great interest. is hardly anticipated that the Anti-suffragists who have lways asserted their earnest desire to see the sphere for women local government enlarged, will stultify themselves by offering ny opposition to the women's clause.

The reason given for the omission of the Women's Suffrage use was the desire that the second reading debate should be concentrated on the general principle of devo-lution, and not on any details of the Bill. We can assure the Scottish members that they would not have woided the Women's Suffrage issue by leaving women of the Bill. On the contrary, such a course would have and the exactly opposite effect. Prominent members on both the exactly opposite effect. From the strong protests had women's Suffrage clause been omitted. We think the he Women's Suffrage clause been omitted. inority of the Scottish members will have reason to be grateful the majority, whose statesmanship secured its re-insertion.

The By-Elections.

The National Union has been conducting a vigorous propaganda campaign in the Grimsby by-election. Crowded neetings, unanimous resolutions, over 1,000 signatures to Friends of Women's Suffrage "cards—these are surely signs" the kind Mr. Asquith has asked for, that there is a real mand in the country for Women's Suffrage; or does he want re Midlothians and Leith Burghs before he will own himself

In N.E. Derbyshire, and possibly in Ipswich, Liberals will women, who might have been supporting their own ince, concentrating their energies on work for the candidate the only party which has adopted Women's Suffrage as part ts official programme

The decision of the Derbyshire miners to run a candidate of eir own, who is entirely independent of the Liberal organisa-in, and stands on the full Labour programme, is an event of ep significance. It means the winning, for Labour and men's Suffrage, of what has hitherto been an impregnable

Minorities.

It is a curious commentary on the party system that, while a ctionary Anti-suffragist minority in the Liberal party and the Cabinet has succeeded in paralysing the professedly enlightened majority, a progressive minority of Suffragists in the Conservative party is so consolidating its forces that its existence bids fair to become a factor of considerable importance the political situation in the near future.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer concluded his Budget speech with an eloquent peroration dealing with the miseries of the people. In the old days, he declared, "they thought it that such things should be) was a dispensation of Providence, and they bowed to it. They are educated to-day, as their masters ere fifty years ago, and they know that, far from its being a Divine decree, on the contrary, it is the mismanagement of What Mr. Lloyd George says of the "people" in a parliamentary sense is true of the women. They know now.

Unearned Incomes which are Earned.

Perhaps politicians are beginning to know that the women know. Mr. George proposes to give relief in the taxation of "small unearned incomes," such as many middle-class women depend upon for the subsistence of themselves and of their children, having earned them as truly as any Chancellor earns his. The struggling professional or business man may have done his share, but what of the wife? What of her years of making ends meet, and keeping up appearances, nursing the children through their childish illnesses, and cooking, and helping the little maid-of-all-work, and making the clothes, and "cutting and contriving," and all the time bearing and rearing the new generation? And the spinster? Brought up in outward comfort, but seeing her health and youth and efficiency pass away while she "keeps house" for elderly invalid parents, and picks her brother out of scrapes, and acts impromptu in loco parentis to all the children of all her married

Potted Politics.

Lord Lamington does not like "women's opinions mixing with men's." We appreciate his point of view. When one of us has to give a judgment upon the proposition that "the country is going to the dogs," it is fatiguing to suspend this judgment until we have read up, not only The Pall Mall and The Westminster, but also The Englishwoman and THE COMMON CAUSE, and all about what The Dog Owners' Annual and the literature of the Dumb Friends' League have to say as to whether good dogs and bad dogs go to the same place. Lord Lamington's plan is so simple: "Are we indebted to the pro-found political acumen of Edwin for the observation, or is it merely a silly hysterical outburst on the part of Angelina?' Messrs. Selfridge with their "ready-to-wear-costumes-to-suitall-figures " system could hardly improve upon this.

Unhappy Plight of a Peer.

"I must get out of this. If I listen much longer, I shall be voting for the Bill!" Rumour tells us that the above was heard to fall from the lips of a peer of mature age as he hurried from the gilded chamber on the afternoon of May 6th. But the curious part of the affair is that his untimely departure took place while a distinguished lord of Anti-suffrage views was upon his feet—whose name, however, we withhold for the milk of human kindness' sake.

The Friendship of Sir Harry Johnston.

Sir Harry Johnston is, no doubt, according to his conscience, a good friend of Women's Suffrage; but, as a wise clergyman once said when someone pleaded his conscience as an excuse for an ill-judged action, "the conscience, my child, needs enlightenment." No doubt Sir Harry thinks the conscience of the Militant Suffragist needs enlightenment; so do we. We think the thing lies there in a nutshell. But the conscience of the distinguished traveller also needs enlightenment, or he could never have condescended to sign his name to "Militancy" in The Westminster Gazette of May 7th. "Although," he writes, I am as convinced as anyone can be of the inherent justice of the woman's claims to possess the Parliamentary vote, of the benefit which will accrue by purifying politics, &c. . . . I am yet arriving most reluctantly at the conclusion drawn by Lord Curzon the other day: that we should cease subscribing, by money or effort, to Women's Suffrage propaganda until outrages on persons and property cease as advertisements of this cause Does Sir Harry realise that even law-abiding Suffragists have red blood in their veins, and that they have just cause to resent such pusillanimous conclusions? They will continue to subscribe by money and effort to orderly Woman Suffrage propaganda, and bear the loss of Sir Harry's support with such charitable regard for his sense of justice as they may find possible. They do not propose to adopt the remedy he suggests, but we give it for what it is worth. "Is there no woman, no super-woman, of sufficient strength and influence to go out as a missionary among the militants, and threaten to throttle or fustigate," &c., &c.

"The Common Cause" in the Deanery.

In "The Making of a Bigot," Miss Rose Macaulay tells us that on the library table of the Deanery of Welchester lies The Common Cause in company with Punch, the Spectator, the Hibbert, and Country Life (no Church Times, Suffragette, or Blue Review being found there). She also tells us that the wives of the superior clergy join the N.U.W.S.S., and her verdict upon all this evidence is that the N.U.W.S.S. is nonparty, non-militant, and non-exciting. In the modest living-room of a middle-aged spinster member of the N.U. we have seen "The Making of a Bigot," so it must be non-party, which it certainly is; non-militant, which it may be; and non-exciting, which is absurd. It is not good to chop logic with so charming a young lady as Miss Macaulay probably is. Now motor-cars speed along so unfussily and so far, they are not quite the thrill they were when each had its own little man with his little red flag to call the attention of the unthinking to its moderate

BUDGET RESOLUTIONS IN COMMITTEE.

CAPT. PRETYMAN (Chelmsford, U.) opened the debate, in a long speech, criticising some of the Budget proposals. He was apparently pained because members on the Government side of the House thought it legitimate and right that heavy taxation should fall on the few wealthy people, and that the control of expenditure by the masses of the people was justified because the tax filtered down to them :-

"If you tell a majority of the people at one time that it does not matter how much you spend because they are not going to pay, and then at the same time, or next day, tell them that they can control the expenditure, and that the class who are apparently to pay have nothing to say to it, that must tend to national extravagance."

MR. SNOWDEN (Blackburn, Lab.), in referring to this argument, reminded Capt. Pretyman that, up to about 1884, this was exactly the position which prevailed. Two-thirds of the national revenue was raised by indirect taxation, which was largely paid by the wage-earning classes, and yet at that time the great majority of people had no votes, and had no voice whatever in determining what the taxation of the country should be. While this condition ruled, said Mr. Snowden, "the predecessors of the honourable gentlemen opposite never made the slightest effort to redress it." Another party in the House is just as ready to take the money from the pockets of women and refuse them a share in the control of the expenditure. Mr. Snowden regretted that, under grants for public health there was not a more definite promise of a national grant for dealing with the question of maternity. He felt sure that there is "no expenditure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could provide which would bring in future generations such a harvest of beneficial results as would accrue from securing the health of every woman during pregnancy and confinement.

MR. HENRY TERRELL (Gloucester, U.) wished to associate himself with these remarks of Mr. Snowden, and agreed "that there was nothing so important for the country than that children being born into the world should be born under healthy circumstances and brought up in healthy surroundings."

It is a matter for congratulation that there were two members in the House to speak on behalf of the unrepresented. Friday, May 8th.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY.

MR. TIMOTHY DAVIES (Louth, L.) moved a Bill to restrict the hours of sale of Intoxicating Liquors in Public Houses on Sunday

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Barnard Castle, Lab.), in seconding the Bill, dwelt on the long hours of employment of men and women engaged in the sale of liquor in public houses. He estimated the number so employed at 300,000, including 23,000 barmaids. He called attention to the evil conditions and long hours worked by barmaids, quoting evidence supplied in an article in the Women's Industrial News, published by the Women's Industrial Council, in support of his statement.

SIR A. GRIFFITH BOSCAWEN (Dudley, U.) opposed the Bill, on the ground that it was an intolerable interference with the liberty of the general public (meaning, presumably, voters). He poured contempt upon the evidence in its favour as shown by petitions in its favour. The hon. member said he knew something about canvassing, and instanced the canvass or plebescite taken in Hull. It appeared that 19,407 householders had voted in its favour, and 5,223 against. That was represented as an enormous majority in Hull in favour of the Bill; but there are altogether 52,000 householders, 30,000 of whom never took the trouble to vote at all. "That shows that these plebescites and canvasses and the arguments adduced from them are really no evidence whatever of the feeling of the people." And not one member murmured the word "Referendum

MR. G. ROBERTS (Norwich, L.) opposed the Bill, because he believed that no new law could be effective unless it secured the acquiescence of the majority of the great body of the people who are to be affected by it, and he was of opinion that those to whom it applied actively resented it.

The Bill was defeated by a majority of 22.

In reply to a question, Mr. Asquith said he feared that it would not be possible to undertake legislation this session on the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Divorce.

[Owing to pressure on our space, we are holding over the account of the debates on Monday and Tuesday till next week.]

The Women's Enfranchisement Bill in the House of Lords.

On May 6th, the House of Lords resumed the debate on the Second Reading of Lord Selborne's Women's Enfranchisement Bill. LORD COURTNEY OF PENWITH spoke with all the weight of his distinguished ability and wide experience, and endeavoured, it is believed with some considerable success, to impress upon the House the extent to which the movement had grown during the forty years since when he first spoke in the Commons in its support, and the sway and power which it now has in the popular mind. Referring to Lord Curzon's attempt to show that women had not adequately exercised their right in voting in a certain L.C.C. election, he stated that he did not know where Lord Curzon had got his figures, and pointed out that the whole significance of any such figures was their relation to similar figures for men voters, London being notoriously slack in this matter. In regard to women's alleged ignorance of Imperial matters, Lord Courtney could only recall two elections-those of 1880 and 1900—when Imperialism had been the turning-point in their appeal to the people. Summing up, he said there was ground for belief that something like the present Bill-some thing, perhaps, more advanced, would within a reasonable time find its way to the Statute Book. The opponents were fighting

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE BROKE, in a characteristically vigorous speech, declared that "the state of exasperation into which some women had been driven was not only bad for the race, but lowered the prestige of the country, and was a matter with which those responsible for good government ought to reckon." After commenting on the deplorable conduct of The Times in giving only three or four lines to the "able and telling speech" of the Bishop of London, and also to that of the Bishop of Oxford, Lord Willoughby concluded with a striking phrase of great significance, that he regarded the debate as " a valuable reconnaissance.

LORD ST. ALDWYN, LORD CREWE (with a tendency to sit on the fence), and LORD CHARNWOOD followed in defence of "the lost cause," their most striking contributions being—on the part of Lord St. Aldwyn—that "women generally were far more impulsive, more actuated by sentiment than men, and that men were given to reason and judgment," and-on the part of Lord Crewe-" In announcing my intention to vote against the Bill, I wish to make it clear I am giving a purely party vote.'

LORD MALMESBURY spoke in support of the Bill, but LORD LAMINGTON declared rather for a House of Assembly of women, for he "strongly objected to women's opinions being mixed up with those of men.

LORD ABERCONWAY declared that the question was fully ripe, that until settled, it blocked all franchise reforms, and that public opinion would be perfectly satisfied if a reasonable measure of franchise for women were passed.

It was reserved for LORD LYTTON to make the speech of the evening. In force, in eloquence, in the gift of carrying home conviction to the doubting, he surpassed himself, and Suffragists should not fail to secure The Manchester Guardian of May 7th, and make themselves acquainted with his line of argument, even though they lost the high privilege of listening to the spoken word.

Among the many telling points he made were that "the only object of our electoral system is to secure a representative House of Commons-representative of every class or body of opinion and that the fact of no woman being a potential voter was quite inconsistent with any theory which it was possible to bring forward of representative government. From the moment they dealt with women only in various phases of legislation, it was impossible to argue that women did not need special representa-

LORD LYTTON paid a noble tribute to those near to him, whom he admired and respected, and in whom he had seen the sacrifice of health, almost life itself. To him, therefore, the pity and tragedy of militancy came home, and, in spite of his hatred and detestation of the action of militant Suffragists, he saw in that action something more than mere folly and wickedness. After stating his opinion that it would be fatal to the interests of either political party for that party definitely to associate itself with a movement that was anti-democratic, Lord Lytton concluded by making anew a profession of the faith that we know to be in him -that he will never pause until he has seen accomplished that which will put an end to the deplorable waste now going on, of courage, devotion, heroism, self-sacrifice—the finest qualities human beings can possess.

What Our Election Policy has Achieved.

Appeal for Funds.

The press boycott, from which every branch of our work uffers, is especially relentless in the case of the Election Cighting Policy. When, however, we gather together and um up as far as possible things unrecorded in the public press the progress of Women's Suffrage during the past two years gst the organised workers of the country, and the results r intervention in elections—we feel that our hopes of this have been more than justified.

Its adoption was, of course, the natural outcome of the scrifice of principle to supposed party interest on the part of beral and Irish Suffragists, when they combined to defeat the ciliation Bill in March, 1912. The situation then created orced us to recognise that the day of the private Member's Bill was over, and that our only chance of enfranchisement was by neans of a Government measure. The only way to persuade nembers that principle and party interest were not in conflict as to get these parties to adopt Women's Suffrage as part of neir official programme. The Labour Party had already done nis; therefore, support of Labour candidates meant the ingthening of a party whose machinery would be enlisted on side of Women's Suffrage, instead of against it. Support abour candidates further afforded a means of putting pressure the Liberal Government. Our task, then, was two-fold:-

(1) To strengthen the Labour Party, so that it might be able to put effective pressure on the Government.

(2) To strengthen Suffrage feeling in the Labour Party, so that it night be willing to put effective pressure.

To consider the second of these objects first: it will be emembered that when, in 1912, we first adopted this policy, ur belief in the intentions of the Labour Party was based on following resolution, which was passed at their annual onference at Birmingham that year by 919,000 votes to 686,000:-

"That this conference, in harmony with its previous decisions, is of the opinion that the enfranchisement of all adult men and women should be included in the Reform Bill to be introduced by the Government in the coming session of Parliament. It further requests the Labour Party in Parliament to make it clear that no Bill can be acceptable to the Labour and Socialist Movement which does not include women."

The ambiguity of the phrase "not acceptable" was recognised from the first, but we hoped that the strongest interpretation would be given to it, and in that hope we decided to support Labour candidates in three-cornered fights. We felt, however, that the 686,000 votes cast against it, including, as they did, the solid vote of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain, was a serious force to be reckoned with in the Labour Party. Accordingly our Election Fighting Fund organisation set to work to do propaganda amongst the Trades Unions, and our Federations and Societies were encouraged to undertake similar

In fulfilment of our hopes, at the 1913 Conference the ambiguity of the 1912 resolution was resolutely swept away. It was the day after the Reform Bill fiasco, and the Conference had passed unanimously a resolution demanding that, after a free vote had been given in the House of Commons on a Woman's Suffrage Bill the Government should take that measure up, and carry it through all its stages. The following amendment was then moved, and amid scenes of wild enthusiasm, added to the resolution :-

"It further calls upon the Party in Parliament to oppose any Franchise Bill in which women are not included."

The voting on this amendment was 850,000 for and 437,000 against, the Miners' Federation of Great Britain remaining neutral, instead of opposing it as in 1912.

This was a great advance on the previous year. We continued to do propaganda work amongst the Unions, and it became evident that the popularity of Women's Suffrage was growing rapidly. The event more than justified our confidence, for in 1914 the Conference passed, with only two dissentients, a resolution in these terms :-

This conference reaffirms its previous decisions on Women's Suffrage, "This conference reaffirms its previous decisions on Women's Suffrage, and declares that the Government can only redeem the pledge it has given by bringing up a Bill to enfranchise both men and women, and requests the Parliamentary Labour Party, in view of the unsatisfactory statements of Members of the Cabinet that Women's Suffrage cannot be dealt with in this Parliament, to raise the question of their enfranchisement at the earliest opportunity next session."

This time the Miners' Federation voted as solidly for the resolution as they had voted against its weaker prototype in 1912.

Not only from the Labour Party conferences do these evidences of growing support come. The Trades Union Congress, which deals on the whole more with trade and less with political questions, has hitherto moved more slowly than such bodies as the I.L.P. and the Fabian Society. This Congress has, for many years past, carried a stereotyped electoral reform resolution, giving a list of some seven reforms desired, sixth amongst which is "the extension of the franchise to all adults male and female." In 1913, for the first time in the history of the Congress, a resolution was brought forward dealing especially with the women's aspect of the question, and carried with only five dissentients. The resolution, most significant in its strong protest against the Government's action, was as follows :-

"That this congress expresses its deep dissatisfaction with the Government's treatment of the franchise question, considering that the Plural Voting Bill is no substitute for the promised Reform Bill, and further this congress protests against the Prime Minister's failure to redeem his repeated pledges to women, and calls upon the Parliamentary Committee to press for the immediate enactment of a Government Reform Bill, which must include the enfranchisement of women." ust include the enfranchisement of women.'

Immensely encouraging, too, was the forward move made by the Miners' Federation of Great Britain when, on October 8th, they officially sent delegates from their annual conference at Scarborough, to a Women's Suffrage Demonstration organised by the National Union in the Londesborough Theatre. W. Brace, M.P., and Mr. A. Stanley, M.P., were the official delegates, but Mr. Robert Smillie (President of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain) and Mr. John Robertson (Vice-President of the Scottish Miners' Federation) also took part, and Mr. Smillie, in the course of a vigorous speech-"I think the women will have all the power the Miners' Federation can bring to bear upon Parliament to bring this measure of justice.

The advance of the miners is typical of what has been going on in the whole Trade Union movement, for we have our ever-growing list of Trade Unions which have passed Women's Suffrage resolutions. These are a few of the outward and visible signs of progress.

So much for the second of our objects. How we have succeeded in the first we shall hope to show in a future article.

For the present we wish to remind our supporters that we have important work in hand in all the chief industrial districts in the country, and we are already committed

(1) To strenuous work in opposition to certain Anti-suffragist Cabinet Ministers by supporting the Labour candidates in their constituencies.

(2) To do all we can to ensure the return of certain (sitting) Labour members who can be relied upon to put pressure on the Government when they are in a position to do so.

The present by-election in N.E. Derbyshire makes a further call upon our funds, but it also gives us a priceless opportunity for continuing the great work in which we are engaged, and of adding to the fine results which our policy has already achieved. We ask all who have contributed to our Election Fighting Fund in the past to contribute again at this critical moment, in order that we may have yet another triumph to record.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN.

At the morning session of the International Women's Congress, on May 8th, Mrs. Creighton announced, amidloud applause, that the Queen has consented to become patron of the English Council. The daily press has anxiously explained that this is not a Suffrage society, though it has passed a Women's Suffrage resolution by a large majority. It is not likely that her Majesty is so ill-informed as to be unaware that though practically all the national organisations of women have declared themselves in favour of Women's Suffrage, this fact has in no way caused them to deflect from the pursuit of the specific object of public utility for which each severally has been founded.

On Saturday last the Queen of Italy received members of the Executive Committee of the International Council of Women, headed by Lady Aberdeen, and also the Presidents of the national sections. She declared herself in sympathy with the woman's movement, and showed a wide knowledge of the various problems affecting women in different lands.

During the week the Council dealt with the question of the maltreatment of women during war, and it was unanimously resolved to request the next Hague Conference to make special international provisions for the protection of women. It was also resolved that each national section should submit to its Government a demand for the abolition of the registration of vice, the closing of all houses of ill-fame, and the stricter supervision of young women and girls, especially those travelling on board Transatlantic steamers.

On May 9th. Mrs. Creighton moved a resolution :-

"That the National Councils do all in their power to secure the protection of harmless birds in their several countries, and to secure legislation to prevent the destruction of beautiful birds for purposes of dress and adornment."

ANTI-SUFFRAGISTS' MIS-STATEMENTS AT SALISBURY.

At an Anti-suffrage meeting held in the Assembly Rooms at Salisbury, on May 5th, several mis-statements were made by Mrs. Gladstone Solomon of such importance that we reproduce a correction of them by Miss Helen Bagnall, of the Salisbury Society within the N.U.W.S.S., which appeared in the Salisbury and Winchester Journal of May 9th :-

"SIR,-May I venture to call the attention of Anti-suffragists amo

"SIR,—May I venture to call the attention of Anti-suffragists among your readers to one or two mis-statements which were made about matters of fact by the speakers who addressed their meeting this week?

"(i) Since the grant of the vote to women the birth-rate in the Australian Commonwealth has risen, not fallen, as Mrs. Gladstone Solomon thought and asserted in answer to a question. The Commonwealth enfranchised women in 1902. In 1911 the birth-rate—271 per thousand—was the highest for ten years; and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years; and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years; and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years; and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years; and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years; and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years; and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years; and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years; and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years, and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years, and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest for ten years, and in 1912 it was 28'65 per thousand—was the highest medical of them. Now, women were enfranchised there only in 1911, so they must, indeed, have been hard at work! To find the number of Bills produced per diem would be a pretty little exercise in arithmetic. And do the Californian women electors really bring in Bills? Even men electors over here cannot quite do that.

"(3) My third point does not touch a mis-statement so much as a setting aside of truth in relation to a great national problem. Mrs. Solomon was deploring, as we all do, the high infant death-rate in England, and she attributed it to the ignorance of mothers, as, again, we must all do to a great extent. But when asked whether the British Medical Association had not asserted that the waste of infant life is a

THE SUFFRAGE TRIUMPH IN FRANCE.

The hearts of Suffragists are warm towards France. Last week we gave the figures of Le Journal plebiscite so far as it was then known. In regard to the final result we quote from Le Journal of May 5th :-

"C'est fini! Le scrutin est clos. . . . Cela nous donne ce magnifique résultats:— 505,972 oui-114 non."

Our readers will be interested to learn that the copy of the paper from which we quote was sent to Mrs. Fawcett by M. I d'Arc, a descendant of Joan of Arc's family, enclosed with letter of acknowledgment to her for her monograph on Joa for which he had asked in the course of some previous correspondence. Mrs. Fawcett has kindly given us permission to reproduce this letter :-

The Danish situation which is at this moment the most immediately hopeful in Europe is summed up by Miss E Hansen in Jus Suffragii. It will be remembered that the Reform Bill which includes Women's Suffrage has already passed through the Lower House, but was met by opposition in the Upper Chamber. Miss Hansen writes :-

We expect the Bill to be signed on June 5th, but as it must be carried by two Parliaments, we shall have new elections, followe by a short Session, and in September women will probably vote for the

This will take pla ipon June 10th and 11th, by which time Danish Suffragists hop they may have already obtained their enfranchisement. M Hansen also mentions an interesting proposal in connection with the amended Constitution.

"As it perhaps will be proposed to our new Constitution to give representation to the different branches of industry, Dansk Kvindesa funds has sent a petition to the President of the Joint Committee the amendment of the Constitution demanding representation of Hou keeping which has such great economic significance for home and State

As already reported, the Swedish elections have proved very unfavourable to the Suffrage cause. Rostratt for Kvinnon however, points out that the importance of the change ma easily be exaggerated.

"Although there is no likelihood of Women's Suffrage again finding a place in the King's speech, there is every probability that it will be brought forward as a party measure this Session, when the Bill can be carried by a combination of the entire 'Left'."

The hope is expressed that the concern shown by Suffragists for national defence will make some impression upon the Co

Kate worships her brother Neil, who is training as gittor, and resents the admiration of Dick Nelson, a handsome but rough g man, who is obliged to work on her father's farm, because his people vasted away all their possessions while he was still a child. Biddy Doyle, comes in to "lend a hand" in the kitchen, has a great admiration for and, deeply as she is devoted to Kate, rather resents her attitude towards oung man

CHAPTER II.

HEN Mrs. Burnsley died, and her daughter gathered the reins of government in her young hands, it became understood that when Biddy was wanted, and told to come to the farm, then she should be paid in money, but when she came of her own accord, because there was more room in the farm kitchen home, then her help was voluntary, and went unrecompensed.

at nome, then her help was voluntary, and went unrecompensed, ate's ways were a revelation and never ceased to astonish Biddy, never before had seen such good order, not even with the "ould hress." Kate had the mental habits that belong to good general—system and regularity were inborn in her. Contrary to the system and regularity were inborn in her. Contrary to the se of many Irish homes, sections of work did not tumble over each at the farm, fragments of the morning's meal did not continue tupy the table till the dinner hour, nor did one utensil serve two dissimilar purposes in succession. In Mrs. Doyle's kitchen, the hat boiled the porridge or the potatoes would, subsequently, be with fragments and refuse of the family meal, and would be did at the kitchen door, that the fowls might use it as a feeding At Laganside, and especially under Kate's régime, each had its own use and place. The fowls were fed in their own r, and the calves never drank from the dairy milk pails. first Biddy used to stand watching, noting where Kate placed and that, and how she did it. Later it became a pleasure to her to the way for Kate's rapid passage. It became Biddy's joyous o forestall Miss Kate in all that was roughest in her work. When Kate to the fields in harvest time, whether to carry drink to the men, y to look on at the reaping, it was Biddy who took care that her cotton sun-bonnet, with the "curtain" that shaded her

Richard Nelson went to work side by side with Micky Doyle 's heart almost broke with the pathos of it; not that she despised ther's occupation, but because she wanted something better and or her old playmate. Biddy often looked at the boundary ditch separated Burnsley's farm from what had been James Nelson's, scalling the latter in some of the more prosperous moments of ort life, wept as if her heart would break, that his son was now no of the common people. Biddy respected herself, and did not the conditions of her own life wretched by any means—for her wanted something more refined, something easier for Richard, because she loved him.
It Nelson adored Kate was obvious to Biddy, but, as she did

She helped Biddy to choose her it blouses, yclept "bedgowns"; when these had been bought dy-made Kate altered them that they might fit more trimly over 's liberal frame. The latter went barefoot over the farm, and Kate's dream as much as hers that there would come a time stout, well-made shoes and trim stockings would be available maid as well as for the mistress. Kate regarded bare feet as natural—she saw them too frequently to think otherwise, but she d footgear more comfortable and superior somehow, and, liking she aspired to this betterness for her one day.

ben Kate thought of the future at all, it was always with her Neil by her side, and of indefinite, interesting things they do together. Then she would be well-dressed, would live in a nouse, and would have leisure for interesting experiences which,

At present her leisure, what she had of it, was spent in remodelling poor frocks, in readjusting the ribbons on her hats, in fashioning thows to be worn of an afternoon. Dress was to her what music is to others, not a vanity, but an art. Her simplest things she wore with an air, and neither rough gowns nor coarse shoes could conceal her young shapeliness. It was not to attract attention that she made her young shapeliness. It was not to attract attention that she made herself her comeliest always; it was for the personal pleasure it gave her to see the roundness of her arms and the smallness of her waist.

Of love she understood nothing; that time brought love to all women, happy or unhappy as the case might be, had not struck her. She never thought of herself as either wife or matron, but simply as Neil's sister, when Neil should have grown great.

Her father had hinted once that, Neil having a profession, the farm should be been in time to the these leavest at the hard that he have in time the state of the state of

should be hers in time, but that had merely suggested to her how dreadful such a possession would be. Farm work, what was it but a constant producing that others might consume? Always ploughing, sowing, and reaping, yet with scarcely a vestige of last year's produce left at the end of the following year; always cooking, if you were a woman, that others might eat, while these others are only that they might work again, and all that labour to end in growing middle-aged, in growing old, and dying without ever having been happy!

If she could not produce anything that, once made, would remain,

If she could not produce anything that, once made, would remain, at least, she wanted to have some good times, to enjoy herself.

The parson said all flesh was grass. Then what was the good of flesh, or, for the matter of that, what was the good of grass either? The cattle ate it, and that was the end of it; and the cattle were slaughtered, and that was the end of them; while man who grew the grass and killed the cattle, worked while he could work, and when he could do so no longer rested in the churchyard where the grass had its revenge, creeping over him, and saying, exultantly: "He is here." And after all there was not much to exult about, for he had here." And after all there was not much to exuit about, for he had not had a very good time either.

She remembered her grandfather and grandmother Burnsley, who had done just as her father did: contended with servants, driven hard bargains for daily work and farm necessaries, struggling desperately bargains for daily work and farm necessaries, struggling desperately to effect small economies, sometimes succeeding and sometimes failing. When they died the parson said fine things about them in the farmhouse parlour; said her grandmother had been a mother in Israel—whatever that meant—and that her grandfather's hoar hairs Then they were buried, which ended the chapter of their history, but the next one went on just the same.

When her father died, there would be a similar eulogy over him, and then the farm and its responsibilities would devolve on her.

But she would escape them. She would sell the farm and use the

But she would escape them. She would sell the farm and use the price to do all the things that were worth doing, and that had hitherto been impossible. Neil and she together, and money available, then life would be worth living! She did not wish her father to die—certainly not. She knew she would be dreadfully sorry when that calamity befell her. Death always made people sorry, but in the case of the old, it was bound to happen, and then the kept-down people sometimes got a chance. Such thoughts only came into her mind when she was tired, and somehow they made her still more tired.

Only the evening before this undercurrent of discontent was definite as she crossed the yard. That day her unwelcome admirer had actually left a posy on the dairy window-sill for her—a rose and a blue forget-me-not, tied together with a band of ribbon-grass.

Of course, she never touched them, but left them to wither, only to be made sorry for them, poor things, when she saw their shrunken beauty in the evening light.

She had been helping with the evening's milking, and was carrying a heavy milk-pail towards the dairy, when the ubiquitous Nelson stepped across an adjacent fence and took her burden from her.

She relinquished it with a faint sigh of relief, and then asked, coldly: "Is your work over?"

"I came for a change of spade. I broke the one I was working with. I broke it on purpose, Kate, for the chance of a word with

"Then I hope my father will keep the price of it out of your pay at the week's end," she answered, viciously.

"That he will, don't you be afraid. You are mortal hard on me, Kate, and L. Llove you so."

Kate, and I-I love you so.

"You don't care what I do, or think," he went on, gloomily.
"No more I do, and when you know that, can't you leave

'I thought I would like to tell you," he went on, wistfully. "There's my brother Ben, he is getting on, and he writes to say he can get me a job where, if I am clever, I could push ahead."

You know you are very clever," the girl answered, derisively.

"Shall I go, Kate?"

He had carried the pail into the dairy, and was watching her as she poured its contents into the wide, flat cream dishes.

"How should I know? It might be a very good thing."

"I could only go if you will promise not to forget me."

She swung round and faced him disdainfully. "I think you mighty imputent," she said. "Who or what are you that I should remember you? I'll tell you what it is Richard Nelson, if you repeat

"You have no heart," he answered, his face pale, his eyes wet with stinging tears. Kate tossed her head disdainfully.

'Will you go back to your work?'' She pointed to the door with the air of an indignant queen, and, without another word, he went. Kate waited till he was out of sight, then she hastened back to the cowhouse. Without doubt, every man and woman about the place was aware of Dick Nelson's assiduities, and was telling throughout the district that Richard Nelson was coortin' Kate Burnsley. The mere thought of the grinning jocularities that would greet such a statement enraged her. And there was no stopping him! Surely she had been rude enough, brutal enough, but it made no difference.

Nelson returned to his toil, the fresh spade under his arm, and Had Kate loved him, he could have done anything for her sake. He would have emigrated, would have discovered gold mines, would have attempted and done the impossible to be worthy of her. But she treated him like a dog. There were moments when she made him feel like a dog, a dog that wanted to bite and

Why had he come back to Laganside after the intervening years in which he had grown from childhood to youth? In other places he would have fared better and have escaped these lacerations. But it would have fared better and have escaped these lacerations. But it was just these that made him feel he was alive. His young and impressionable years had been passed where the scents of the heather on these particular hills had filled his nostrils and their outlines had satisfied his eyes; idealised hours of play had been enjoyed when, her hand in his, and her short steps striving to keep pace with his strides, Kate Burnsley and he had raced down the lanes from school together. She had been a winsome child then. He remembered how she had done the honours of the farm, showing him all its attractions when his mother brought him there one day, for the purpose of negotiating a lean from Mr. Burnsley, as he surmised later: how she had shown his mother brought him there one day, for the purpose of legislating a loan from Mr. Burnsley, as he surmised later; how she had shown him the young pigs and the pea-fowl, and had forced her toy rabbit on him as a gift when he went away. But that was before she had learned to regard a farm as a dull prison and a farm-boy as a clod.

ANTI-SUFFRAGE FALACIES.

Madam,—" Magna est veritas, et prævalebit"—so we are told, and try to believe it, but truth has a hard tussle for it sometimes, and there are sturdy falsehoods which seem to defy all attacks and to

there are sturdy falsehoods which seem to defy all attacks and to rise up again and again with perennial vigour, however often we may have thought to demolish them.

We need, therefore, not be too much surprised to find Lord Curzon, in the recent debate in the House of Lords, again reviving the good old argument that before women are given the vote they should "make more active use of the privileges they already enjoy," and giving as an illustration the fact that only "one" woman was returned at the last London County Council election. His exact words are: "In these municipal elections women have the right returned at the last London County Council election. His exact words are: "In these municipal elections women have the right not only to vote, but also to stand. But their indifference to the discharge of their duties is only equalled by the indifference of the electors to their claims—(laughter)—because at the London County electors to their claims—(laughter)—because and in the whole Council election only one woman was returned, and in the whole of the elections throughout the country the number was also insignificant. Therefore I submit that before my noble friend asks Parliament to give this new vote to women possessing the municipal franchise, it would be better for him to impress upon them the more active use of the privileges which they already enjoy."

The truth then is, that there could hardly be a more striking example of how useless the municipal vote may be to a woman, without the parliamentary vote at the back of it, than this failure of the women candidates at the London County Council elections. Twelve women came forward for election; why were only two (not "one," as Lord Curzon inaccurately says) successful? Because you cannot get on to the London County Council unless your party backs you in a constituency where our party is in a majority. Miss Adler and Miss Lawrence were the only two women candidates who stood under these conditions, and they were both elected. Why are the women candidates not more often supported in this way? Because the party organisations, who manage these affairs, are worked by men for the benefit of men. Why have women no influence with their party organisations? having the parliamentary vote, are a negligible quantity, from a party point of view.

(I should like to say here, in parenthesis, that the Labour Party (I should like to say here, in parenthesis, that the Labour Party stands entirely outside these strictures, which only apply to the Progressives and Municipal Reformers, representing, of course, Liberals and Conservatives.

It only requires a glance at the figures of the election to see that (putting on one side the two Labour candidates and the one Independent) the remaining seven ladies, although supported (nominally) by their parties, were all standing in constituencies where they hadn't the ghost of a chance of being elected:—

Is it any wonder that only two women should have been elected, or that only twelve should have been found ready to come forward and spend their money, time and strength in these futile efforts to claim "the privileges they already enjoy"?

In every case be one these ladies stood with a man colleague of the same party, the electors had had any animus against the woman they might ha shown it by refusing to vote for her. There is no trace of such feeling, the votes received by each candidate being practically equa.

Obviously the real crux of the situation lies in the fact that these elections every woman who gets in is keeping a man or and it seems incredible that men of the ability and experience. Lord Curzon should be so steeped in ignorance as to be unaware facts that are common knowledge to anyone who has ever even dabbin local electioneering. Yet, in the face of these plain facts, in or to clinch an Anti-suffragist argument, he, and many like him, anot ashamed to cast these unfounded and unworthy aspersions women as a class, nor to sneer at those failures and misfortum women as a class, nor to sneer at those failures and women as a class, nor to smeet at most rained at the state of the series of the series

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

Madam,—Side by side with the cause of the enfranchisement women a movement is advancing, quietly but steadily, among tenfranchised for the establishment of what is known as proportion representation. It is a movement in which advocates of Wom-Suffrage should take more than a passing interest; indeed, there many reasons why it should have our active support. For the of of "P.R.", as it is familiarly called, is to make the franchise a m of "P.R.", as it is familarly called, is to make the franchise a muc more effective instrument for giving expression to the wishes of voter. Many of the leaders of our cause have lent their names to the reform. Thirty years ago the late Professor Henry Fawcett wroten and spoke on its behalf; our honoured President has taken a prominer part in its advocacy; Catherine Helen Spence, who helped to with the Suffrage for the women of Australia, was an equally enthusiast pioneer of "Effective Voting" as they term it in Australia. What then is the complaint which is brought against the presensystem by those who have votes; and what claims has the P.I. movement for the support of us who have none? It is urged the the present system of electing one representative at a time in sing member constituencies destroys in great measure the value of the the present system of electing one representative at a time in sin member constituencies destroys in great measure the value of franchise. For one thing it gives the elector no real choice in selection of a representative. What, for instance, is a Liber Suffragist to do if he is a voter in Mr. Asquith's constituency? can make a protest by voting for the Prime Minister's opponen whose views on most public questions he detests—but this is enabling him to choose a representative. Timid Liberal organisation a little disconcerted by the action of militant Suffragists, are unwill to endorse Suffragist candidates of pronounced views. Some of the properties grad of an excuse for the withdrawal of their supports. are perhaps glad of an excuse for the withdrawal of their supp for the enfranchisement of women has become, what they did really want, a serious issue in politics. Candidates of the type Sir Victor Horsley, although their Liberal principles are unquestion are turned away. This restriction of choice hits our movement double way. Electors vote for the official party candidate lest party lose the seat. The official candidate, even if favourable, hesit to give whole-hearted pledges to carry our movement to victory,

"P.R." involves the abolition of single-member areas and creation of constituencies returning several members each. This we give freedom to electors to vote for Suffrage candidates in every constituency; the Suffrage candidates within each party will be to state their views in clear and unmistakable language; there we have predicted the expectation of the same party and in the same party and i be candidates supporting our cause in every party and in ev

The movement for "P.R." is worthy of our support upon bro general grounds of justice and freedom. But for us it has additional merit; the conditions which it will set up should make the accomplishment of our own aims. At present we are endeave to achieve success by tactics because the present system election compels us to pursue this course; but the pursue this course; but the pursue this lose its terrors. A vote in the Commons will represent conviction to the fulfilment of a pledge given in the hope that there no need to redeem it. "P.R." will for a certainty secure and all parties the discussion of our aims upon their merits; and their merits they must and will win.

A B C OF WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE. TWO SIDES TO A DOOR.

MAY 15, 1914.

"Men," said Mrs. Poyser in Adam Bede, ". can see through a barn door, they can. Per'aps that's the reason they SEE SO LITTLE O' THIS SIDE ON'T!"

Perhaps this is the reason why some people can see no reason for giving votes to women. The refusal of them is like a big door barring the way of greatly needed social reforms; and those who want to keep it shut are constantly staring through it into the future, and seeing beyond it "red ruin and the breaking up of laws," the collapse of the Empire, and the deterioration of the human race. But as Suffragists were often told in the days when all the happy results of women's enfranchisement lay also in the uncertain future. Now-a-days many doors like that which bars our way have been opened, and we can all see that on the other side lie no such terrors as were feared, but on the contrary much good.

"What do you women really expect from Women's Suffrage?" we are asked. We answer that

WE EXPECT WHAT OTHER PEOPLE HAVE EXPERIENCED. We point to the lands where women do vote, and to the laws passed by men and women together, which have had the effect of amending much of the injustice from which voteless women inevitably suffer, of bringing about better wages and better conditions of labour, of improving the national health and reducing infant mortality. We note the testimony of responsible men in every State which has adopted Women's Suffrage, all agreeing with the unanimous verdict of the Australian Senate that

THE REFORM HAS BROUGHT NOTHING BUT GOOD.

To this the Anti-suffragist replies that the experience of other States can give no guidance to a great Empire like ours, and that instead of being misled by what we can actually see we should believe in the disasters which he perceives clearly through the shut door, He will not allow that the facts which are brought to his unwilling notice afford any evidence that what is good for Australia, for instance, would be good for England.

Granting that the evidence is insufficient, still it all points the same way.

THERE IS NO EVIDENCE AT ALL TO THE CONTRARY.

And, since men are men and women women all the world over, our facts do show that a mixed electorate does not necessarily spell disaster. Should it prove disastrous in England the fault will not lie with our sex but with our individual selves. It will only show that English women are less fit to vote than all the women who are enfranchised already. IT WILL REST WITH US TO DISPROVE THE EVIL PROPHECIES.

Because they are pre-occupied with the calamities of the future nearly all Anti-suffragists are blind to the ills that are actually rife in the present. They will not look; they will not listen or believe; they accuse us of inventing or at least exaggerating the evil in order to excuse our unreasonable desire for the vote. They implore us piteously to let well alone. To us who have realised the symptoms

EVEN A RISKY CURE IS BETTER THAN THE DISEASE,

We cannot disprove the prophecies; we can only take our stand on present facts. We cannot guarantee that no women voters will desert their homes; but we know that thousands of women now have no homes to leave. Women voters may neglect their children; how many children are suffering to-day because the State neglects them? Women voters may usurp men's professions; thousands now are constrained to oust men from work unfit for women. Women voters may have a low moral standard; what standard is set now by laws which punish in women what they condone in men?

WE HAVE NO RIGHT TO BEAR THESE ILLS WE HAVE if there is even a chance that Women's Suffrage may help to mend them. It will not bring the millennium. It may not bring wholly unmixed good—what great change does !- but the awful consequences which loom so large in the eyes of its opponents are only possibilities; whereas the ills it may cure are here now, poisoning our national life and slowly producing that moral and physical deterioration which is dreaded by Suffragists and Anti-suffragists alike. Men and women have spent their lives trying to stem these evils by other means. They have accomplished much; but with the women's vote

THEY COULD HAVE DONE SO MUCH MORE.

We Suffragists do not profess to see through the closed door, but our faith in the good beyond it gives us courage to face the ugly facts on this side. Antisuffragists have no faith in the future, so they are driven to idealise the present. It behoves us then, with all the clearness soberness and patience we can command, to help them to see more truly.

The Lords and the Step Forward.

At the conclusion of our report on the House of Lords' debate on Lord Selborne's Women's Suffrage Bill, which was still proceeding when we went to press last week, we observed that another step forward had been made. No one who was present in the House could doubt this. The serious and, for the most part, high tone maintained, the representative and responsible positions of those who supported the Bill, the acute anxiety evinced by Lord Curzon as mover of the rejection, and his dependence upon a bitter and insistent appeal to the prejudices created by militancy—all these things made for an atmosphere of intense reality.

Lord Curzon professed to suspect that Lord Selborne desired an "academic discussion." We suspect that "academic discussion" was not the only thing Lord Selborne was thinking about. Something practical was in his mind which he put to the proof when he made this apparently "academic" attempt to initiate franchise reform in the Lords. Everybody knew the Bill would be defeated, and it was; but everybody did not foresee that the circumstances of its defeat would be such as to put new heart of grace into the Suffragists. Lord Ampthill characterised as tactless the action of those who had compelled the Lords to discuss the matter at this time of political danger and anxiety. Fact is an elegant virtue, but it is only one of many weapons in the armoury of the spiritual warrior.

Lord Willoughby de Broke perceived the inwardness of the situation. "I am sorry," he said, in reference to Lord Ampthill, that he is going to die in a different ditch from what I am,' and, relapsing into the military phraseology with which the Ulster crisis has made us familiar, he declared the debate to be a valuable reconnaissance. Here we come to grips. We read daily in our newspapers of what a powerful minority, grimly determined, can do. We see that it can paralyse physical force itself. The whole circumstances of the Lords' debate have shown to an astonished world, and to the party machines, that there is some such power as this in the stronghold of Conservatism fighting for the women.

The Press have taken this Second Reading very seriously. The Westminster Gazette, while not advancing too far from cover ("militancy the obstacle") comes into the open in an important front page leader on May 7. Averring that-

"step by step this movement has gained ground—often with the co-operation of opponents who have themselves given away the logical ground of opposition—until its eventual success on the political side is scarcely in doubt."

It sums up with a shrewd word of advice to the party men on the situation :-

"We sympathise with the Liberal Suffragists who object to a class vote, but there must be something experimental in a first measure of enfranchisement, and all parties must be ready to make some sacrifice to get a step forward."

It is that step forward! While the Liberal hare sleeps, the hated "Tory" tortoise may take it, perhaps is taking it even

The figures in the division were 104 against and 60 for-a result which is a bitter pill to the Anti-suffragists who had felt

The canvassing returns in connection with the Bill give some rty more to each side. A Suffragist strength of ninety in the rds, with some of the strongest of the Conservative front ak men in it, is not negligible, and it is evidently the very eere wish of the Liberal press that their party leaders should so regard it. Not only The Westminster, but The Daily News The Chronicle, as well as The Manchester Guardian and The n, are all in their degree at one in this. The Nation treats ne situation created by Lord Selborne's action in a leader of great significance that we may be excused for quoting

ely:—

It is rare for a progressive measure to be defeated in the Lords so slight a majority as 44, and such a division may well give cheer sharpening Tory appetite for a Suffrage Bill". . . "The passage Home Rule will leave the Liberal Party free to think of the future, at political question confronts it larger and more imminent than man's Suffrage?". . . "Some women will at the coming eral Election support Liberal candidates irrespective of their views the suffrage. Others will not, and of this last section some will the Labour Party outright, and others will confine their help to ragists, and withhold it from 'Antis.' These tactics imply an ediate withdrawal of force and enthusiasm from working Liberalism, they mean more than this. They signify that a new need has en in the State, and Liberalism being not at hand with the approte remedy, will lose permanently a mass of new recruits that should up automatically for its support. Thus far, therefore, Liberalism sets to be a national force, and leaves its initiative and its formative k to its rival, the Labour Party, or even to its enemy, the Tory to its rival, the Labour Party, or even to its enemy, the Tory, So far as Conservativism is concerned we have no doubt at nat if a Tory Government comes in this year or next, it will pass lited Suffrage Bill."

The Nation has a record that places it above suspicion of asserving; it desires that the party in which it still believes, conourable co-operation with Labour, should wrest from the ervatives, before it is too late, the undying glory of loosing political bondage of British women.

the meanwhile, The Times has been publishing some ing articles on woman and her place in the State, and a ing Post leader-writer recently devoted some space to the ssion of his indignation at the disabilities imposed upon girl Post-Office clerk because she has no vote. The face of vaters is troubled. The next—the decisive—step forward be taken, and with any party able to form a Government he happy chance of taking it. But the choice will not always

In hesitation lies certain loss. Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide n the strife 'twixt Truth and Falsehood for the good or evil side ome great cause, God's new Messiah, offering each the bloom or blight,

'arts the goats upon the left hand from the sheep upon the right,
'And the choice goes by for ever, 'twixt that darkness and that light.' For the rest-we Suffragists observe and ponder and pare, and through it all we press unceasingly on, insistently nding a Government measure for the enfranchisement of en, and we shall never forget, in our approaching triumph, friends who stand by us now.

Civil Service Typists.

The women typists employed by the Civil Service of this try have, at last, had an opportunity, by means of the Royal ission on the Civil Service, of laying before the public the ent conditions of their employment, the points upon which are dissatisfied, and the directions in which they desire to nanges made. Unfortunately, the general public has never covered how extremely interesting Blue Books really are, the evidence given with so much clearness, moderation, and ess by Miss Charlesworth, as a representative of the Civil ce Typists' Association, is not likely to be widely read. is a great pity, since no impartial person can read her vers without being struck by the valuable education which peaker has evidently received from her business experience, without realising how disadvantageous is the position of en employed in a great business where no woman has a say management. As a Suffrage tract Miss Charlesworth's in which there is not a hint of Suffrage-would be valuable

Vomen enter the Civil Service as typists between the ages ghteen and thirty, by means of an examination, which the ciation would like to see made a better test of general ation. They are paid 20s. a week, rising by annual ements of 2s. to 26s. Promotion to a higher grade does occur until they have served a full year at the 26s. maximum, ugh they may be required at an earlier time to pass a hand examination and perform all the duties of the upper

' examiners " if they are employed in checking the work done in their department. Typists do not pass automatically into the class of shorthand typists even after having passed the necessary shorthand examination. A Treasury minute of 1908 "pre scribes that only half the staff, exclusive of superintendents. may be graded as shorthand typists. Unless there is, in the department in which the typist is serving, a vacancy in the higher grade, a typist cannot . .

Shorthand typists, therefore, after serving seven years, may be kept indefinitely doing the work of shorthand typists without receiving the shorthand typists' rate of pay, until by marriage, death, retirement, or promotion, some shorthand typist leaves a place open, or until some increase in the number of employees allows for the appointment of another shorthand typist. On every woman thus kept waiting, the Treasury saves 2s. a year, since the shorthand typist receives 28s., rising to a maximum of 31s. A superintendent is paid 35s. a week, and can only receive more by becoming a chief superintendent. Many superintendents "on that scale are responsible superintendents in small departments," the number of workers varying according to the department. Where more than six are employed two of these may be superintendents on this scale; where more than ten are employed one of the two may be, but is not always, paid as a chief superintendent, beginning at 40s. and rising to a maximum of £130 per annum. Where more than twenty ordinary and shorthand typists are employed, a special allowance may be asked, and in three cases had been granted by the Treasury. These three chief superintendents were advanced from £104 to £110, rising by increments of £5 to the usual maximum of £130. Beyond the last-named figure no woman typist can apparently rise in the Overtime seems to be not uncommon, and is paid for at the rate of 9d. per hour for typists, and 1od. per hour for shorthand typists; but only fifteen hours' overtime in a month is paid for, although in various departments more hours are sometimes worked. For instance, in May, 1913, when Miss Charlesworth gave her evidence, she stated that "in the London Telephone Service all shorthand typists, and typists and superintendents, are doing a great deal of overtime, but only fifteen hours in a month of four weeks is paid for. Superintendents are not paid at all for overtime." The leave allowed to typists and shorthand typists, whatever their length of service, is eighteen days a year; to superintendents, twenty-one; and to chief superintendents, twenty-eight.

Male typists and shorthand writers in the Civil Service would appear to be almost invariably considerably better paid, although certain superintendents of typists are set down at £,91 only. The salaries for shorthand writers in various departments vary from £104 to £300, and the lowest figure for a typist (in the London Traffic Branch of the Board of Trade) is 27s. per week-one shilling above the maximum, at six years' service, of a woman typist. But men typists are not numerous in the Civil Service. Mr. Bernard Mallet, Registrar-General, being "Why are the typists always women?" answered, "It seems that women are found to do the work much better. I do not think men are employed on typing work in public offices."
"They do not do it so well?" "I do not think they do it so

It is not, therefore, because of superior efficiency that men typists—such of them as remain—are so much better paid than the women. Nor is the underpayment of the women due to the prevalence of a very low rate for skilled typists outside the Civil Service. In fact, 17 per cent. of the women who entered that Service as typists left in the course of thirteen years to get better paid work outside; and a table put in by Miss Charlesworth shows that, out of 372 outside cases collected, a quarter of the women who had been at work for over fifteen years were earning 54s. or more a week; half, 46s. or more; and three-quarters, 35s. or more; whereas of 379 cases of civil servants, all the fourteen who had served over fifteen and less than twenty years were earning 35s. or less, while there were as many as eleven out of eighteen who had served over twenty years earning 35s. or less. That the women typists cannot live on their pay during their first year or two in the Civil Service is indisputable, and those who are not, to use Miss Charlesworth's words, "bolstered up by relatives or friends," have to do overtime work. She quoted a case of one who, earning £1 a week in the telephone service, worked all last year in the House of Commons four evenings a week from 5.0 to 11.0. Others in like case spend their hours away from the office in sewing, washing, or household work, and, of necessity, bring down their food to the lowest possible measure. So hard and A few typists may receive an extra 2s. weekly as | dull a life reacts upon health, and when the women's absence from sickness is shown to be slightly higher than that of men, the fact is quoted as a reason for paying them at lower rates. Upon which Miss Charlesworth remarks, with characteristic moderation of statement: "It would seem to be an economic blunder to pay women so low a salary that they cannot maintain a proper standard of health to keep themselves continuously fit for their work."

The changes for which the women typists ask-as much in the interest of the public service as in their own—are mainly that women should be engaged as clerks, the standard of education, &c., being at the same time raised, that they should work at first only as typists and shorthand writers, and be gradually promoted to other clerical duties; and that arrangements should be made for facilitating the transference of typists from one department to another so as to prevent "stagnation in departments where only a few typists are employed," and to assist a more even distribution of promotion. They also, of course, desire an improvement in their, at present, extremely

The Majority Report announces the conclusion that "amalgamation" of typists and clerks "is impossible," but promotion should be permissible to the clerical staff for special merit." The signatories to this report are of opinion that "education is . . . a secondary consideration in selecting typists," while "manipulative skill is an essential They do not seem to have realised either that a reasonable degree of "manipulative skill" can be acquired by almost any young person in six months, nor that a typist whose general education does not reach rather a high level is unfit for anything but the merest routine work. They recommend that the salary of typists shall rise to 32s. (instead of 26s.), and that of shorthand typists beginning at 26s. (instead of 28s.) shall rise to 42s. (instead of 31s.) All overtime should be paid for. With regard to superintendents, the Majority Report makes no recommendations. On these points the "Majority" Report expresses the conclusion of seven Commissioners out of nineteen. Nine others think that promotion of typists to clerkships should be generally possible, and not reserved merely for special merit. The Minority Report, signed by three members of the Commission, makes no specific recommendation as to women typists. These figures should be carefully remembered by all persons interested in the welfare of the women who are serving their country in the character of Civil Service typists. Especially should they be remembered when, if ever, the findings of the Commission come to be dealt with by the House of Commons. CLEMENTINA BLACK.

HIAWATHA'S EXPEDITION.

All alone went Hiawatha
From the great Pits of the Midlands
To the meetings of the Council,
To the Town Hall down in Chelsea.
Very dull she was, and simple,
Very new to all the talking,
Much bewildered by the speeches,
By the questions asked and answered,
By the motions and amendments,
Points of policy and order.
"These are very clever women,"
Thought our Hiawatha slowly,
"I could never ask such questions,
Once, twice, and even four times,
Never have the skill to answer
When I didn't understand them;
I must once again go northwards, I must once again go northwards, Here's no place for such as I am." But the steward at the doorway Recommended Woman's Kingdom As a place to pass the time in Till the mid-night train went Northwards,
As a place where all the women
Who were wisest in the nation
Would reveal the best of all things, Where to live and how to live there, What to eat, and what to think of, Where to go for education. There our simple Hiawatha There our simple Hiawatha
Learned their ways and all their secrets,
How our Leader learned to lead us,
Why the others were so clever;
And the gloom upon her spirit
Soon gave way to beams of gladness,
Till, when later, she went homeward,
In the night-train to the Midlands,
Loud and long she sang a war-song:—

"We will build a little cottage In the land of smoking pit-heaps, Cheap it is, and very simple, (Though the price excludes the ground-rent), We shall furnish it for five pounds, In an hour with lightning sketches

Photographs and Suffrage posters,
Then we'll shut the door and leave it,
For we'll live within the backyard
(Tho' the price excludes the ground-rent);
There we'll have a set of camp-beds
Made of gaspipes laid on trestles;
From the money won by cunning
From the Income Tax collecter, We will clothe ourselves in green stuff
Very fit for active service,
We will wear our under-garments
Hand embroidered and hand woven,
Very beautiful and simple,
And they'll button round us frontwards.
All of porridge shall our food be,
Oatmeal porridge, milk to drink, too,
And our children and our neighbours
Shall be all co-educated.
Then, indeed, our lives shall make us
Grow in wisdom and in courage
Till we're wise as is our Leader.
Then when night sinks o'er the pit-heaps
And the moon peeps round the chimney,
We will also dig our backyard,
And prepare our Suffrage speeches
For co-educated pit-folk "——
Thus departed Hiawatha

co-educated pit-folk

Thus departed Hiawatha
Singing songs of the Hereafter,
Vanished from before their faces
In the smoke that rolled around her,
The Pukwana of the Pit-heaps!

[We are glad to see that the seed sown at Woman's Kingdom is already springing up and even bearing flowers and fruit. We hope, however, that Hiawatha's "twenty horse conveyance" will be acquired by honest means!-ED., C.C.]

Members of the National Union are beginning to realise the importance of street selling, and sellers are coming forward well; but, of course, we shall need a great many more before we can have regular pitches all over London. N. E. DERBYSHIRE BY-ELECTION.

Candidates: Mr. J. Martin, Labour.
Mr. J. P. Houfton, Liberal.
Major Harland Bowden, Unionist.

Electorate 19,702.

Polling day May 20th.

Organiser in Charge: Miss C. M. Gordon, M.A. Committee Rooms: The Old Armoury, High Street, Staveley. Speakers and Workers: Miss Andrew, Mrs. Chew, Miss Dring, Mrs. Earp, Miss Giles, Mrs. Renton, Miss Margaret Robertson, Miss Sheard.

The campaign here has hardly yet got under weigh, but speakers and workers are gathering up, and meetings, at the rate of about six a day, are being planned. The situation is by no means simple, but the issues at stake are great, and a mighty effort will be made by the Labour Party to get a strong and quivocal declaration by the Derbyshire miners, by the return Mr. Martin to the House of Commons, that the party to which they are, as trade unionists, affiliated, has their wholehearted support in the political field. Labour feeling has never been tested in this constituency since Labour and Liberalism have never before been brought into conflict, and it is early days yet to say how the miners will respond to what is, to many of them, new propaganda. But if Independent Labour politics have a certain novelty, it is nothing to the novelty Women's Suffrage! But the receptions we have already met with encourage us to think that we shall splendid and enduring support.

We are not at present holding joint meetings with the Labour Party. It is necessary first for us to do Suffrage propaganda and convert the electorate to our point of view. But when we have done this it should be easy to win their upport for Mr. Martin. For not only does he represent the only party pledged to Women's Suffrage, but whilst the other candidates, in their ection addresses, entirely ignore the Women's Suffrage question, Mr. Martin deals fully with it in the following paragraph :-

"I would support a clean sweep of all the absurd and unjust anomalies in our electoral system. For the existing tangle of complicated franchise there should be substituted a simple franchise conferring the right upon a man as a man, and a n as a woman, not for what they have remove the existing sex disability, must be regarded as entirely unsatisfactory."

Moreover, at the meeting of the Labour Party workers on Saturday, when Mr. Martin was formally adopted, he declared that he "had always been in the Old Market Place at night, and at midday in Riley Square, favour of female Suffrage," and Mr. Peters, in announcing the offer of help which had come from the N.U.W.S.S., spoke of the previous contests in which he had worked with the Union, and declared that he would not now like to go into any contest without the help of the women.

As for the constituency, it is a somewhat scattered oneabout sixteen or seventeen miles from end to end-with a large number of villages, half-a-dozen of which seem to be about equal n size and importance. Our plan of work is to hold hall meetings in these larger places, and to hold a great many openair meetings, covering all the smaller villages. Each day we shall send out in the morning two teams of speakers, who will hold a couple of meetings each, at 11 and 4 o'clock, and return or the indoor meetings at night. Staveley is not the largest illage, but it is the recognised centre of the constituency, and has the advantage of being on two railway lines. Here we and the Labour Party make our headquarters (the Liberals are in Chesterfield). It has been no easy job to find "quarters" at all, but now we are fixed up in the Old Armoury, the Recruiting Hall, the home of the Boy Scouts (who, by the way, were here till midnight on Saturday whitewashing the place for us), and the Labour Party are established in the Primitive Methodist Schoolroom and vestries

The great pull which Mr. Martin will have over his opponents in this fight is his inside knowledge and experience of the miners' life. He made a most effective reply the other day to the Conservative candidate's claim that his two years' residence in the constituency qualified him to speak for the miners. "I," said Mr. Martin, "came to Chesterfield when I was a little lad only eight years old. My father had been out on strike sixteen weeks-victimised for his opinions. He was a bleacher in Nottingham. We had tramped the country for weeks, and at last he put mother and us four little lads in Basford Union, and it was when he got his first job in Staveley that he brought us out. Since that I've worked twenty years in the pit-trapping, trans-contracting, checkweighing. Who do you think understands your needs and can represent you best?'

It is reported that Mr. Houfton has not the support of the Liberal headquarters, who do not desire a three-cornered contest, and rumour says that he will have no prominent Liberals (save Sir Arthur Markham, who lives in the district) on his platform. It will be interesting to see whether events confirm this.

As usual, we want far more money than we have got. Our indoor meetings are entirely limited by the amount of money we have to spend on halls, and all our meetings depend upon motor-cars. Please help us by sending a special donation as soon as

Result: Mr. T. G. Tickler (U) ... 8,471 Mr. Alfred Bannister (L) 8,193 Unionist Majority 278 Unionist Majority in last Election 698

Grimsby is a Suffrage town, and propaganda work has been carried out under the most favourable circumstances, the way having been well prepared during the last two years by the local Society, mainly owing to the indefatigable efforts of Mrs. Ketching . and Miss Stephenson, joint Hon.

Both candidates announced that they were in favour of Women's Suffrage, and both mentioned the fact in their speeches, with the result that the sale of THE COMMON CAUSE outside the meetings was most satisfactory, and the collecting boxes brought in a good harvest. Excellent work was done by Miss Ford and the Old Market Place at night, and at midday in Riley Square, where there was always an audience. The Organiser in charge, Miss Violet Harris, writes :-

"At one of the dinner-hour meetings, the Antis tried to disturb us, and their hired man distributed Anti-Suffrage literature, which the recipients destroyed under his nose. Our only retort to the attempts to break up our meetings was quietly to get "Friends of Women's Suffrage" cards signed by the listeners at the Anti-suffrage meetings. Our Friends' cards signed at the time of going to press number over 1,000. We have been extremely particular that none but genuine friends shall sign, but there has been no difficulty about this, as Grimsby is mostly

Miss Violet Harris reports that the Grimsby police are perhaps the most sympathetic she has yet met. The Chief Constable called at the Committee Room on her arrival, and volunteered the fact that he would help the suffragists in every way, and he has been as good as his word. Many tales of the keenness of listeners are told. One lady said she would gladly pay a barrel organ 10s. to stop, that she might hear Mrs. Earp

Thanks are offered to all helpers in the campaign.

IPSWICH BY-ELECTION.

The Conservative candidate is Mr. F. G. C. Ganzoni. The Liberals are keeping the secret of their proposed candidate, but the name of Sir Edgar Vincent is now mentioned. The fight is expected to be unusually keen, and all sorts of political organisations are flooding the town. The Town Council has adopted an extraordinary attitude towards the non-militant Suffragists, as is shown in the letter quoted below from the N.U. organiser, Miss Waring.

To the Town Clerk, Ipswich.

organiser, Miss Waring.

To the Town Clerk, Ipswich.

Sir,—After due consideration of the terms offered to the N.U.W.S.S. by the Mayor and Corporation for the hire of the Public Hall, I have decided to refuse them. At the same time, I must protest against your treatment of the non-militant Women's Suffrage Union.

You say you take pledges from Party men to pay for damages done at their meetings; but you refuse our pledges, and ask for insurance policies, and suggest a reason which is insulting in the extreme, namely, that we may not be in a position to redeem our pledges.

These said insurance policies are to be taken out by the two Suffrage Societies concerned, not for the two days on which their meetings are to be held, but for the election fortnight. In other words, the women are to pay through their insurance for all damage done to your hall during that period, quite irrespective of any consideration as to whether men or women are responsible for it.

Further, insurance policies, for some obscure reason, are not enough. You ask for £50 deposit as well.

You tell us that police protection cannot be given us at indoor meetings, even if invited, and you imply that it is not the business of the police to be on the scenes till after damage is done, even though you have amply demonstrated that the possibility of damage is foreseen.

I can quote examples that prove that this is not the course of action taken in other towns. If it were, it is conceivable that the state of affairs that now obtains in Ipswich might be typical of the rest of the country, instead of being extremely unusual.

In view of your refusal of police protection, I wish to make it clear taken in other towns. If it were, it is contection, that now obtains in Ipswich might be typical of the rest of the country, instead of being extremely unusual.

In view of your refusal of police protection, I wish to make it clear In view of your refusal of police protection, I wish to make it clear that I shall advise the N.U.W.S.S. in case of any damage done to us or to the premises that we hire during the election, to recover the cost from the Corporation under the Riot Damages Act of 1886.

May I quote the judgment given in a similar case on November 18th, 1913, in the County Court of Sussex at Hastings:—

"The law of England very properly imposes upon all citizens the duty of helping, when necessary, to keep the peace, or of paying damages to those who suffer loss by their neglect of this duty.

This right is as old as our Saxon forefathers, who placed upon the Hundred the liability which we place upon the ratepayers.

It means that liability which we place upon the ratepayers.

It means that liability which we place upon the ratepayers.

It means that liability which we obtain a laways been accorded by the community to law-abiding citizens, even though they are women who hold advanced opinions; and rightly so, for history is eloquent to show that the heresy of to-day may become the accepted faith of the more enlightened generation of to-morrow." lightened generation of to-morrow.

THE WOMENS' MUNICIPAL PARTY.

The "At Home" in connection with the Women's Municipal Party given by its President, the Duchess of Marlborough, at Sunderland House, on May 12th, showed conclusively the emptiness of the statement that women take no interest in local government. The ball-room at Sunderland House was filled to the doors by women representing every Party and almost every conceivable interest. The Duchess took the chair and opened the meeting with a telling speech on the aims and programme of the Party: an organisation which has been formed (on an entirely "non-party" basis) to further the election of suitable women candidates to London local government bodies. Dr. Sophia Jevons (Education Committee, L.C.C.) gave an extremely able and informative address on the work of the L.C.C., and made what may be called the "dry bones of local government live. Her speech was followed by a magnificent appeal from Mrs. Philip Snowden. The audience was so numerous that an overflow meeting was held.

All enquiries should be addressed to the Secretary, Mrs. G. F. Abbott, at the offices of the Party, 62, Oxford Street, W.

PARTY POLITICS IN LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

Some good Suffragists were among the deputation headed by Lord Courtney of Penwith, which waited upon Mr. Herbert Samuel on May 8th to ask for facilities for the Municipal Representation Bill, a Bill to enable municipalities to adopt a system of proportional representation in the election of municipal Most women will readily endorse their plea that the introduction of party politics into municipal elections makes the selection of the fittest person exceedingly difficult. It may be added that when that fittest person is a woman of small means and little leisure, the difficulties are increased.

CONSERVATIVE AND UNIONIST WOMEN'S FRANCHISE ASSOCIATION,

The C. & U.W.F.A. entertained a large and distinguished company at their annual dinner and reception at the Hotel Cecil,

May 12th. The programme consisted of a speech from Lord Henry Bentinck, M.P. (who seconded Mr. Dickinson's Bill in the House of Commons last year), a delightful Suffragist recitation by Miss Margaret Bussé, and a most enjoyable programme of music by Herr Henbert's orchestra.

Lord Henry Bentinck said Suffragists might congratulate themselves on the result of the W.S. debate in the House of Lords. Lord Willoughby de Broke had described it as a "reconnaissance." It had certainly revealed the weakness of the enemy and been a demonstration of reasonableness and enlightenment on one side, and prejudice and ignorance on the Lord Henry said he believed that one result of enfranchising women would be that political questions would be judged more on their merits, and stripped of party cant and bias. Parliament was at present very busy with the interests of men-workers with votes; but it had scandalously neglected the interests of the voteless women-workers. Deputations from women to Ministers always received the same answer: We are willing enough but we haven't the time to attend to this matter. In conclusion he

We social reformers are apt to be too individual in our views—we "We social reformers are apt to be too individual in our views—we neglect opportunities of combination and co-ordination with other reformers who are striving for the same good ends. The temperance reformer thinks that drink is the root of all evil; the housing reformer thinks that bad housing conditions are the cause of drink; the evangelist believes that it is only by appealing to the hearts of men that progress can come; the social reformer says it is no use preaching to a man with an empty stomach; the individualist distrusts legislation, the politician pins his faith to it. We may all be right, but we are all wrong as well, because we all neglect the chances of getting help from the women."

THE LADIES' NATIONAL ASSOCIATION AND THE BISHOP OF LONDON'S BILL.

WOMEN AND CHURCH COUNCILS.

At a recent vestry meeting at St. Luke's, West Holloway, the following resolution was carried, without a dissentient :-

"That this vestry is of opinion that the qualification of churchwomen for voting in the Councils of the Church should be identical with those of churchmen, and the ratepaying limitation abolished without delay. That the representatives of this parish on the Ruri-Decanal Conference be desired to convey to that body a request to find a method of carrying out this reform through their representatives on the Diocesan Conference."

THE WEST OF ENGLAND CAMP FOR WOMEN.

A WOMAN'S CAMP.

The "West of England Camp for Women," to be held near Weymouth from May 30th to June 6th, will run on much the same lines as the "Convoy Camp" held at Rottingdean last year, a photograph of which we reproduce.

The chief feature of the Suffrage Camp will be a large tent where meetings will be held. This will also be used as a diningtent, and there will be besides a library tent and enquiry office for literature, a camp kitchen, and members' tents.

The number of members encamping will be limited to eighty, and tents will be allotted in order of application. The charge will be 25s. a week for members willing to share a tent; the charge for those desiring a single tent will be an additional ros.

The necessary furniture for each tent-i.e., bedstead, mattress, pillow, two blankets, washstand, chair, and small table will be provided; but should members desire sheets and illow-cases they must bring their own, and also towels.

The simple life will be in operation during the camp week. dembers must rise at 7.0, make their own beds, and after preakfast, at 8.0, get their tents ready for inspection at 9.30.

occupied by lectures on some branch of Suffrage work, followed by a free time, when nembers may indulge their propensities for bathng, cycling, and he like. In the fternoon expediions to adjacent illages for propaganda work will take place, and after the early supper at 6.45 an rening meeting ill be held in the ig tent. Lights 10.30. waste water pit and other sanitary inveniences will be provided, and an incinerator which all rubish must be

A good water supply from the Weymouth water company will be laid on, so that no fear of contaminated water need deter anyone from joining the camp. Moreover, two lady doctors are to be mong the members, and also a nurse, so that accidents of any sort, should such happen, can be dealt with at once.

The officers of the camp will comprise a Camp Superintendent, who will inspect the tents and keep an eye to the camp generally; a Financial Secretary to receive all payments; a terature Secretary; Organisers to arrange the meetings and get beakers; and last, but by no means least, Cooks, two in number Weymouth is in an ideal situation, and in addition to its other attractions, is in the heart of Thomas Hardy's Wessex, being the scene of the "Trumpet Major," a novel of his best period. Quite apart, therefore, from the opportunities for elping the Cause, the holiday should prove very enjoyable.

The scheme is among the first fruits of the Active Service League, and among the speakers will be Mrs. Harley, founder of the League, Mrs. Rackham, Dr. Sloan Chesser, and Mr. Cameron Grant.

It is hoped that members will avail themselves of this opportunity to wear the Active Service League uniform, so that the green, scarlet, and white of the N.U. may become well known as the colours of the law-abiding Suffragists; but this is not compulsory. Members are allowed to dress as they like, but it is evident that jewellery, tight skirts, and fancy blouses are out of place in camp life.

This is the first time that a Suffrage Camp has been organised, and "in the fierce light that beats" upon the Suffrage cause at present many eyes will be watching the experiment. It should therefore be an example in showing what loyal co-operation and a spirit of real comradeship will do to forward the cause we have at heart. We know that these principles are at work among women, and it is ours to demonstrate them to the outer world.

Will any member of the Union wishful to join the camp communicate at once with the Camp Superintendent, Miss Thurstan, Apple Tree Cottage, Kingston, near Taunton, who will be able to supply all further details.

Miss Thurston makes the following appeal to members of the N.U.W.S.S. who would like to help with the camp, but are prevented from coming themselves:

"I should be very grateful indeed if those interested in this bit of work for the Active Service League would send me promises of food for the camp. We are hoping to get eighty campers, so that the catering for such a large family is no light Promises of home-made jam, biscuits, potted meat, hams, tea, cake, vegetables, &c., will be very welcome; but I should be glad to know as long beforehand as possible what is coming, so that I can provide accordingly.'

GREAT SCOTTISH DEMONSTRATION.

A Scottish Nation, consisting of a procession and mass-meeting on Glasgow Green, is to take place on June 20th. All men's and women's organisations in Scotland have been invited support our resolution, proposed by leading speakers from numerous platforms. It is hoped to have among these many of our chief National Union

This movement is the outcome of the refusal of the Prime Minister to receive the deputation from men's organisations from all over Scotland, which was organised to coincide with the Albert Hall meeting on February 14th. We appeal to all our Scottish Societies to make this the very largest and most important of all demonstrations ever held in Scotland. Handbills with the preliminary arrangements are to be had from Miss K. W. Lindsay, Glasgow Society, Women's Suffrage, 202, Hope Street, Glasgow.

ABERDEEN'S SEND-OFF TO MISS LUMSDEN.

Representative ladies and gentlemen bore testimony, at an "At Home" in the Grand Hotel on May 6th, to the services rendered to the cause of Women's Suffrage by Miss L. I. Lumsden, LL.D., who is leaving the city to take up her residence in Edinburgh. Professor J. Arthur Thomson presided, and at the commencement of the proceedings, Mrs. Black, the Vice-President, presented Miss Lumsden with a beautiful bouquet from the Aberdeen Committee. Dr. Elsie Inglis expressed sympathy with Aberdeen, and said that in Edinburgh they were looking forward with great joy to the day when Miss Lumsden would come to live amongst them.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF PRAYER.

The following have consented to serve on the Committee of the Fellowship recently announced in The Common Cause:—
The Lady Betty Balfour, Mrs. Harley, Miss Gardner, Miss Hay-

Miss A. M. Royden has been appointed Hon. Secretary to the Fellowship. During her absence abroad, correspondence should be addressed to Mrs. Meyer (3, Cedar-court, Brent Garden Village, Finchley, London, N.), who has kindly consented to act pro. tem.

Sunday Meetings in Hyde Park.

We should like to make another appeal for stewards for the meetings which take place every Sunday in Hyde Park. They offer an excellent opportunity for securing new "Friends of Woman's Suffrage," and anyone who will give an hour or two to this very valuable work will be warmly welcomed. Will volunteers send their names to the N.U., or, if they find themselves unexpectedly free, will they go straight to the Reformers' Tree on any Sunday afternoon at three o'clock. "Friends' cards will be supplied to them from the platform.

Report of Literature Department.

Societies having offices or shops would do well to provide themselves with one of the charming little Suffrage shields in plaster which were shown by Miss Bousfield at the Woman's Kingdom Exhibition, and are now on sale at 3s. The design is that of the Tudor Rose, in red on a white ground, and the shield is edged with green. Societies having sales and garden fêtes might like to avail themselves of a free offer of some rolls of strip admission tickets, marked : Afternoon, 6d.; Evening, 3d.; which were used at the Exhibition. These may be had for the cost of postage, as the words "Woman's Kingdom Cottage" would need to be erased.

Press Report.

The debate in the House of Lords on Lord Selborne's Bill and its defeat, draws forth from the Liberal papers this week much interesting comment.

The Daily Citizen, May 7th, says :-

"The Dauly Citizen, May 7th, says:—
"The poverty of argument on the part of the Anti-suffragists, whose views were taken up by Lord Curzon, is very striking. Lord Curzon says that he opposes giving women the vote because the great mass of them do not want it. That is not true of this country, and the result of the plebiscite taken the other day by a Parisian journal shows that it is equally untrue in regard to the women of France."

The Manchester Guardian, May 7th :-

"What matters most at the moment is that even in the broadest and deepest existing reservoir of Conservatism there is fair reason to hope that there is now a Suffragist minority of something like one-third of the whole."

Lady Aberconway, in an interesting article in the Daily Chronicle, challenges Lord Curzon to prove the statements he made in the House of Lords regarding the indifference of women as citizens to their municipal duties :-

"Unless he can disprove the facts given in reply by his Grace the Bishop of London, honour demands that he, as a responsible official of the Anti-suffragist Society, should cease to circulate the unfair statements he made in the House of Lords, that he should withdraw all literature issued by his Society that takes that ground, and that he should see to it that paid speakers on his Anti-suffrage platforms no longer mislead the public in this matter."

An important letter should be noted in this week's Labour Leader, from Mr. W. C. Anderson, dealing with Mr. Wallhead's implication of an "Alliance" (his own word) between the National Union and the Independent Labour Party.

"Nothing has ever been suggested beyond a friendly unfettered co-operation between forces having a common rallying point in the political freedom of women. The political subjection of women is a deep insult to half the nation; it is poisoning the whole of our political life; it will more and more impede the progress of the other causes we care for; it should be ended speedily, as much in the interests of men as of women."
