Beloved Pippa

Many thanks for letter and good offices as regards pastels etc.

Simon is heart-broken about Scotland. He says he is in the vein for doing a series of little mountain pastels calculated to ravish the English public and thinks Scotland would be especially attractive to them as well as to him. He says one month is not long enough, it must be two at least. What about the West coast? Do you think Ethel Melville or any of her sisters would know of any agreeable lodging? But nothing can be done I feel till we arrive and talk things over. This will be shortly - It is most vile of you to accept an invitation to the Chances just as we appear. It will probably be on the Thursday before Whitsunday & May 31st. I think it is safe to set about looking for the nurse and to book her for that day. It will be the greatest comfort to go first to bg. in fact impossible to continue the journey to Allenswood on the same day. I am getting exceedingly excited at the thoughts of seeing you all again. How horrid of Lytton to fall ill. Please give him my fondest love and tell him I am exceedingly vexed. I had a letter from Constance Lloyd, delighted with your visit. Simon wrote a most exquisite note to Blanche about Duncan a few days ago. No answer received as yet. This reminds me of your blanche robe as the Daily Mail calls it. You needn't expect to see it till we return and I shall probably have to wear it in the interval. Not one single garment can I put on my back, some too big and some too small
