INTRODUCTION

THE volume here presented, as the first Register of the London School of Economics and Political Science from 1895 to 1932, covers thirty-seven years in the history of the School, but covers only thirty years of graduations in the University of which the School forms part. The Register proper is confined substantially to those who would now be described as regular students of the School, pursuing, by day or evening, full courses of study designed to lead to degrees, diplomas or certificates. The School has always had, in addition, many other students. Its courses have been open, under inter-collegiate arrangements, to regular students of other colleges. It has admitted large numbers of those who are now described as "occasional" students, attending for one or more lectures only, and standing in varying relations to the School. Some have come under organised schemes of instruction such as that arranged with the Railway Companies for members of their administrative and clerical staffs; many have been former graduates, pursuing interests acquired in the School; many have been working for examinations outside the School or the University of London. Some of these formally occasional students have in fact taken full and active part in the life of the School; but to select them on any principle out of the whole body would be impracticable. On the other hand, to include all the occasional students, even if the records made this possible, would swell the Register to an unmanageable size and destroy its reality. Substantially the regular students to-day are the student body as it would be understood in other University institutions.

Since the latest reconstruction but one of the University of London (1900) the School has been an integral part of the University. It is in this aspect that the Register presents the School. The Register is a record of those who have graduated from the School up to the session 1931-32, rather than of all those who have studied here. To those who have graduated in the strict sense, taking internal degrees of the University of London as students of the School or (in a few cases) taking external degrees after two years or more at the School, the Register adds a large number who have taken University diplomas or certificates granted by the School itself; all these under the latest constitution of all (1929) would be internal or associate students of the University, as well as students of the School.

But though the limitation of the Register in the way described is enforced by practical considerations and is justified by the present character of the School, it does not altogether fit the beginnings of the School. In the language of to-day our early students were all occasional. Preparation for examinations formed no part of the original purposes of the School. "It is not proposed," said the first Calendar in 1895, "to prepare students especially for any examination, but the lectures and classes already arranged will be found useful to candidates for the following public examinations among others, viz., Civil Service (Class I and Indian), Council of Legal Education, Institute of Bankers, Institute of Actuaries, London University (Mental and Moral Science), London Chamber of Commerce (Commercial Education)."

The place of the University in this enumeration, pitchforked between the Actuaries and the Chamber of Commerce, is significant of the time. There was in 1895 no teaching University of London, no internal degree, no University professoriate, no Faculty of Economics. There was an examination authority, equally prepared to test in London or elsewhere, students prepared elsewhere or in London or not formally prepared at all. There were individual colleges, University, King's, Bedford, and others of distinguished history, but with no organic relation to one another or to the examining authority. Young as the School of Economics is, it is older than anything that can fairly be described as a University of London; the former examining authority was in London, but not of it, and might appropriately have been known by another name. It rendered valuable services, but not particularly in or for London. The teaching University as it has grown since 1900 out of the London colleges is a new thing altogether. Even to-day it is worth while to emphasise this fact, so that the academic revolution effected in the last generation may be understood. In Britain revolutions have a way of happening without being noticed by the inhabitants. It is quite in character that the University of London, as a potential subject of benefactions, should have become visible to the Rockefeller Foundation in New York seven years before (through the efforts of Lord Macmillan) it became generally visible in the City of London.*

Whether any of those who attended the School of Economics in its early years in fact found its courses a help to external graduation in Mental and Moral Science can hardly now be determined. The bulk of the early students came with no such purpose in view. According to the recollection of one of them, the first students of all consisted of five women, coming in the train of Professor Graham Wallas from University Extension, and four men, of whom one, the present Lord Snell, acted as secretary to the Director, Mr. W. A. S. Hewins, while another, Dr. Max Beer, surviving the argumentative assaults on his Marxist philosophy made by the whole teaching staff of the School, became well-known later as a writer on social and political issues in Germany. Two of the other students were also German; one, Dr. Helene Simon, wrote a well-praised book on Robert Owen. The number of teachers was in double figures from the start (exactly ten) and the number of students cannot long have remained in single figures. The Calendar for 1896-97 claims that more than 300 students (including 75 women) joined the School in the first year and that of these "100 undertook the whole or part of the three years' course of study established at the School, or were engaged in other systematic work." But no official record of the names, studies and qualifications of these students has yet been unearthed in the archives of the School. They cannot appear in the Register.

Fortunately, a place can be found for the most distinguished names of the early days in the Appendices; they appear, as holders of Research Studentships, as Presidents or Chairmen of the Students' Union, or as members of the teaching staff. Among these may be mentioned the first full-time student enrolled at the School, Professor A. J. Sargent, who came to the School in 1896 as the holder of a scholarship from Brasenose College, Oxford; he was second Chairman of the Students' Union and his name appears in the list of teachers of the School from 1898. Other honoured names which appear in Appendices only are those of the late Professor Lilian Knowles, Mr. F. W. Hirst, Mr. Tom Jones, Professor Hilda Oakeley, Sir Percy Ashley, Professor H. O. Meredith, Mrs. H. A. L. Fisher, and the late Professor George Unwin; all these were holders of Research Scholarships. The name of Miss Barbara Hutchins is recorded among the winners of the Hutchinson medal.

The reconstitution of the University of London in 1900 changed fundamentally the environment and, in due course, the objectives of the School. A system of internal degrees obtainable only after courses of approved study was established. This system included a degree in Economics under the control of a Faculty of Economics and Political Science (including Commerce and Industry), independent of the other Faculties such as Arts and Laws, with which, in most other Universities even to this day, Economics is combined. The original Faculty counted ten members, of whom eight (including Mr. A. L. Bowley) were on the staff of the School.

The following extract from the Calendar for 1900-01 marks the opening of the new era:

"The changes made in the University of London and the position in relation to the University now attained by the School will give a new significance to the work of the students. The lectures and classes at the School will still be open to those who are not 'internal students' and cannot, for various reasons, pursue a full University course. But it is most desirable that students of the School should make full use of the opportunities afforded them by the reconstitution of the University and that as soon as the necessary regulations have been made by the Senate they should, if possible, become 'internal students' of the University and proceed to a degree in the subjects of the new Faculty. The students of the School have so far belonged to certain well-defined groups of people:—

(i) those whose main object has been to acquire a sound training in economics and political science and the methods of investigation appropriate to those subjects, with a view to tutorial or professorial work, or research, or because they appreciate the importance of a knowledge of these subjects in relation to general education;

(ii) those who recognise the utility of such general scientific training, combined with some detailed knowledge of some group of subjects, in relation to business and professional life, e.g., bankers, merchants, railway officials, etc.;

(iii) those engaged in public administration, central or local; 'persons engaged in or about to engage in the public service, whether in this country, in India or the colonies' and 'persons engaged or about to engage in public life or in the administration of public law, as Members of Parliament, Magistrates, etc.' (Gresham Report, p. xliii).

They have pursued their studies; many of them have undertaken a very severe course of training, sacrificed their leisure and involved themselves in considerable expense in order to attend regularly the lectures and classes at the School; but at the end of their course they have so far had no certificate, diploma, or degree which they could produce as evidence of their attainments. As 'Internal Students' of the University under the new régime they will be able to pursue courses of study prescribed by the University authorities, submit themselves to the test of the University examinations, and proceed to degrees which will undoubtedly be held in high estimation."

The change of orientation thus made possible did not lead at once to a rapid growth of University studies at the School. The total number of students, whose names were printed in successive calendars, rose rapidly from 443 in 1901-02 to 1,275 in 1904-05, including the present Director of the School* and to 2,137 in 1913-14, but till 1905-06 or so the

* After the session 1905-06 only the names of graduate, undergraduate and Army class students were printed. The undergraduates of the University of London were 155 in 1906-07 and 154 in 1907-08.

University students must have been an insignificant fraction of the whole.

The first degree recorded in the Register is the Doctorate of Science in Economics conferred in the session 1902-03 on Miss A. E. Murray (Mrs. C. A. Radice) for a thesis on the Commercial and Financial Relations between England and Ireland. This is the only entry for that year, and as late as 1907-08 the Register shows only three graduates, one with a higher degree and two Bachelors of Science in Economics; there are also three recipients of the newly-founded School Certificate in Social Science. But from 1908-09 the number of students graduating mounted rapidly till the interruption caused by the war. Just after the war came the fresh impulse of the Commerce Degree (for which courses began in 1919) and of the Ph.D.; the influence of these in the records of first and higher degrees respectively stands out in the statistical table printed below. Ever since the war, a rapid growth in the number of regular students of normal University type has been accompanied by a decline of those listed as occasional. In nine years from 1923-24 to 1932-33 the number of regular students of the School has risen from 782 to 1,340. The inter-collegiate students, who are nearly all University students of other Colleges, have also risen from 155 to 481. The occasional students have fallen from 1,708 to 1,118.

Between the effective beginning of the Register in 1902-03 and its end in 1931-32 are two other changes of like character. The School began as a place of evening study and of part-time teachers. Those who came to learn were for the most part already in employment. Most of their teachers were men already occupied elsewhere, giving evening lectures as a by-product of other interests. Only in this way could the School, with its ludicrously small financial resources, have obtained, as it did obtain, men of the high distinction that it needed.

The change in the constitution of the teaching body of the School during the period covered by the Register is illustrated by the following table based on the lists of teachers given in the two parts of Appendix F. Omitting those who appear both before and after the end of the session 1918-19, the table records in the 24 years 1895-1919 33 names (in Part I) of teachers on the regular staff, and 294 names (in Part II) as occasional teachers. In the period after 1919 the corresponding numbers are 119 in Part I as being on the regular staff and 124 in Part II as occasional teachers. Of the 33 teachers on the regular staff between 1895 and 1919 17 had had their first University training at Oxford or Cambridge, 8 in London, and only 1 in any other British University. Of the 119 on the regular staff since 1919, 44 came from either Oxford or Cambridge, 42 from London, and 15 from other British Universities. It may perhaps be of interest to add that, in the current session 1933-34, of the regular staff of 89 shown in the Calendar, 15 had had their first University training in Oxford, 25 in Cambridge, 34 in London, 7 in other British Universities, and 8 in Universities outside Britain.

The change over from evening teaching alone to the present plan by which nearly all important courses are given both by day and in the evening is naturally not recorded in the Register, but appears in the successive Calendars. A few classes for "morning" students are mentioned in the second Calendar, for 1896-97, but the formal lectures then and long after were practically all given between 6 and 9 p.m. Not until 1906-07 were lectures given regularly in the morning; the time-table of the session before records a short-lived experiment by which the hours from 10 to 1 each day were devoted to supervised reading of "house students" and no lectures were given at all.* Even so late as 1913-14 more than half the 134 courses shown in the time-table took place after 5.30 and only one-fifth were in the morning. Not till 1919-20 was a distinction made between fees charged for day and evening courses; it is only from 1920 that the numbers of day and evening students can be clearly distinguished and compared. In the session 1923-24 the regular day students numbered about 440 and the regular evening students about 340. In the session 1932-33 the former had risen to 796; the latter had risen also, though less, to 544.

The School got its first large body of day students in the demobilisation period after the war. The development of a substantial body of full-time teachers dates from the same epoch. As a college comparable to most other University colleges the School is not even thirty-seven years old, but less than fifteen.

In the thirty years of graduation from 1902-03 to 1931-32, the Register records 2,428 names. Among these 1,333 are men and 1,095 are women. Nearly all the men are graduates with three or more year's study in the School. The great bulk of the women are holders of diplomas or certificates, in Sociology, Social Science, Geography, involving normally only two years' study. The proportion of men to women at any one time in the School is accordingly more than the Register suggests; of late it has been three to one.

The first of the thirty years, 1902-03, is represented by one name; the last, 1931-32, by 243 names. The growth of total numbers between those years, and the distribution between different degrees, diplomas and certificates are given in Table I. The chart shows the total numbers graphically; its features are the marked rise from 1908 broken off by the World War and resuming on its close; the demobilisation peak of 1922-23; and the accelerating rise of recent years. The total of all the figures in Table I (2,551) is greater than

* "To meet the wish of certain public bodies, arrangements have been made for the supervision of morning study in the case of scholars and other students for whom such supervision is expressly stipulated either by public authorities or parents or guardians. Such students are known as 'House Students.' The hours of supervised reading are between 10 a.m. and 1 p.m. House students are expected to read in the library between those times for not less than two hours on each of four mornings in the week, and for a total of not less than 10 hours a week."

the total of names in the Register (2,428), because persons proceeding from one degree or certificate in the School to another appear twice.

Of the separate sections the B.Sc. (Econ.) degree and the Social Science Certificate (from 1912-13) are largest; the B.Com., LL.B. and B.A. degrees are also post-war developments at the School. The Higher Degrees, though they begin the record, remain few in numbers till the coming of the Ph.D. in 1919; their recent growth is notable. Of the total of 267 recipients of Higher Degrees, 152 had obtained their first degrees either in the University of London or some other British University, while 115 were students from overseas. The number of women is about one-fifth of the whole, 52 out of 267.

For over 1,000 of those in the Register, the information is confined to the records of their time in the University. No doubt a good many of these, in addition to a known obituary of 39, are no longer living; with many more, through change of name or address or through foreign residence, it seems no longer possible to establish communication. For 1,387 men and women, further information, supplied by themselves in response to a form of enquiry, is available.

The records of these 1,387 who have filled in the form of enquiry are a mine of interesting information about after-careers, marriages, publications, and so forth. It is not possible here to do more than indicate the results of one or two preliminary explorations. Thus an analysis of the occupations pursued by 1,195 of the students shows Social Work (following on the Social Science Certificate), School Teaching or paid research, and Business as the three largest groups, accounting between them for 60% of the whole, with University Teaching and Government Service, sharing another 24%, not far behind; the balance falls to "other professions" and "further study" (the higher degree graduates of the next few years). The occupation taken for this analysis is for day students the first occupation after completing the course; often this is of a preparatory nature, e.g. research assistance. For evening students the occupation is that pursued at the time of taking the course; complete changes of occupation, though not unknown, are uncommon. The distribution by occupations in relation to the several degrees and diplomas is shown in Table II. As might be expected, higher degree students are chiefly engaged in or preparing for University work. Among B.Sc. (Econ.) graduates other teaching or paid research work claims 28%, Government Service 21%, business 16%, University Teaching 13%, other professions 7%, and social work 2%, while 13% are recorded as proceeding to further study on graduation. Of the B.Com. graduates 60% are now in business, while the 13% of "other professions" is mainly composed of accountants.

On another point of some interest, the subsequent distribution of the graduates by countries, the Register, through incompleteness of the returns, is less informing than might have been hoped. In regard to some 1,840 former students it is possible to say that about 84% are still in the United Kingdom or the Irish Free State, 10% in the British Empire Overseas, and 6% in foreign countries. But the true proportion of all past students that would be found in these last two groups, as distinct from those who have filled in forms, is almost certainly larger.

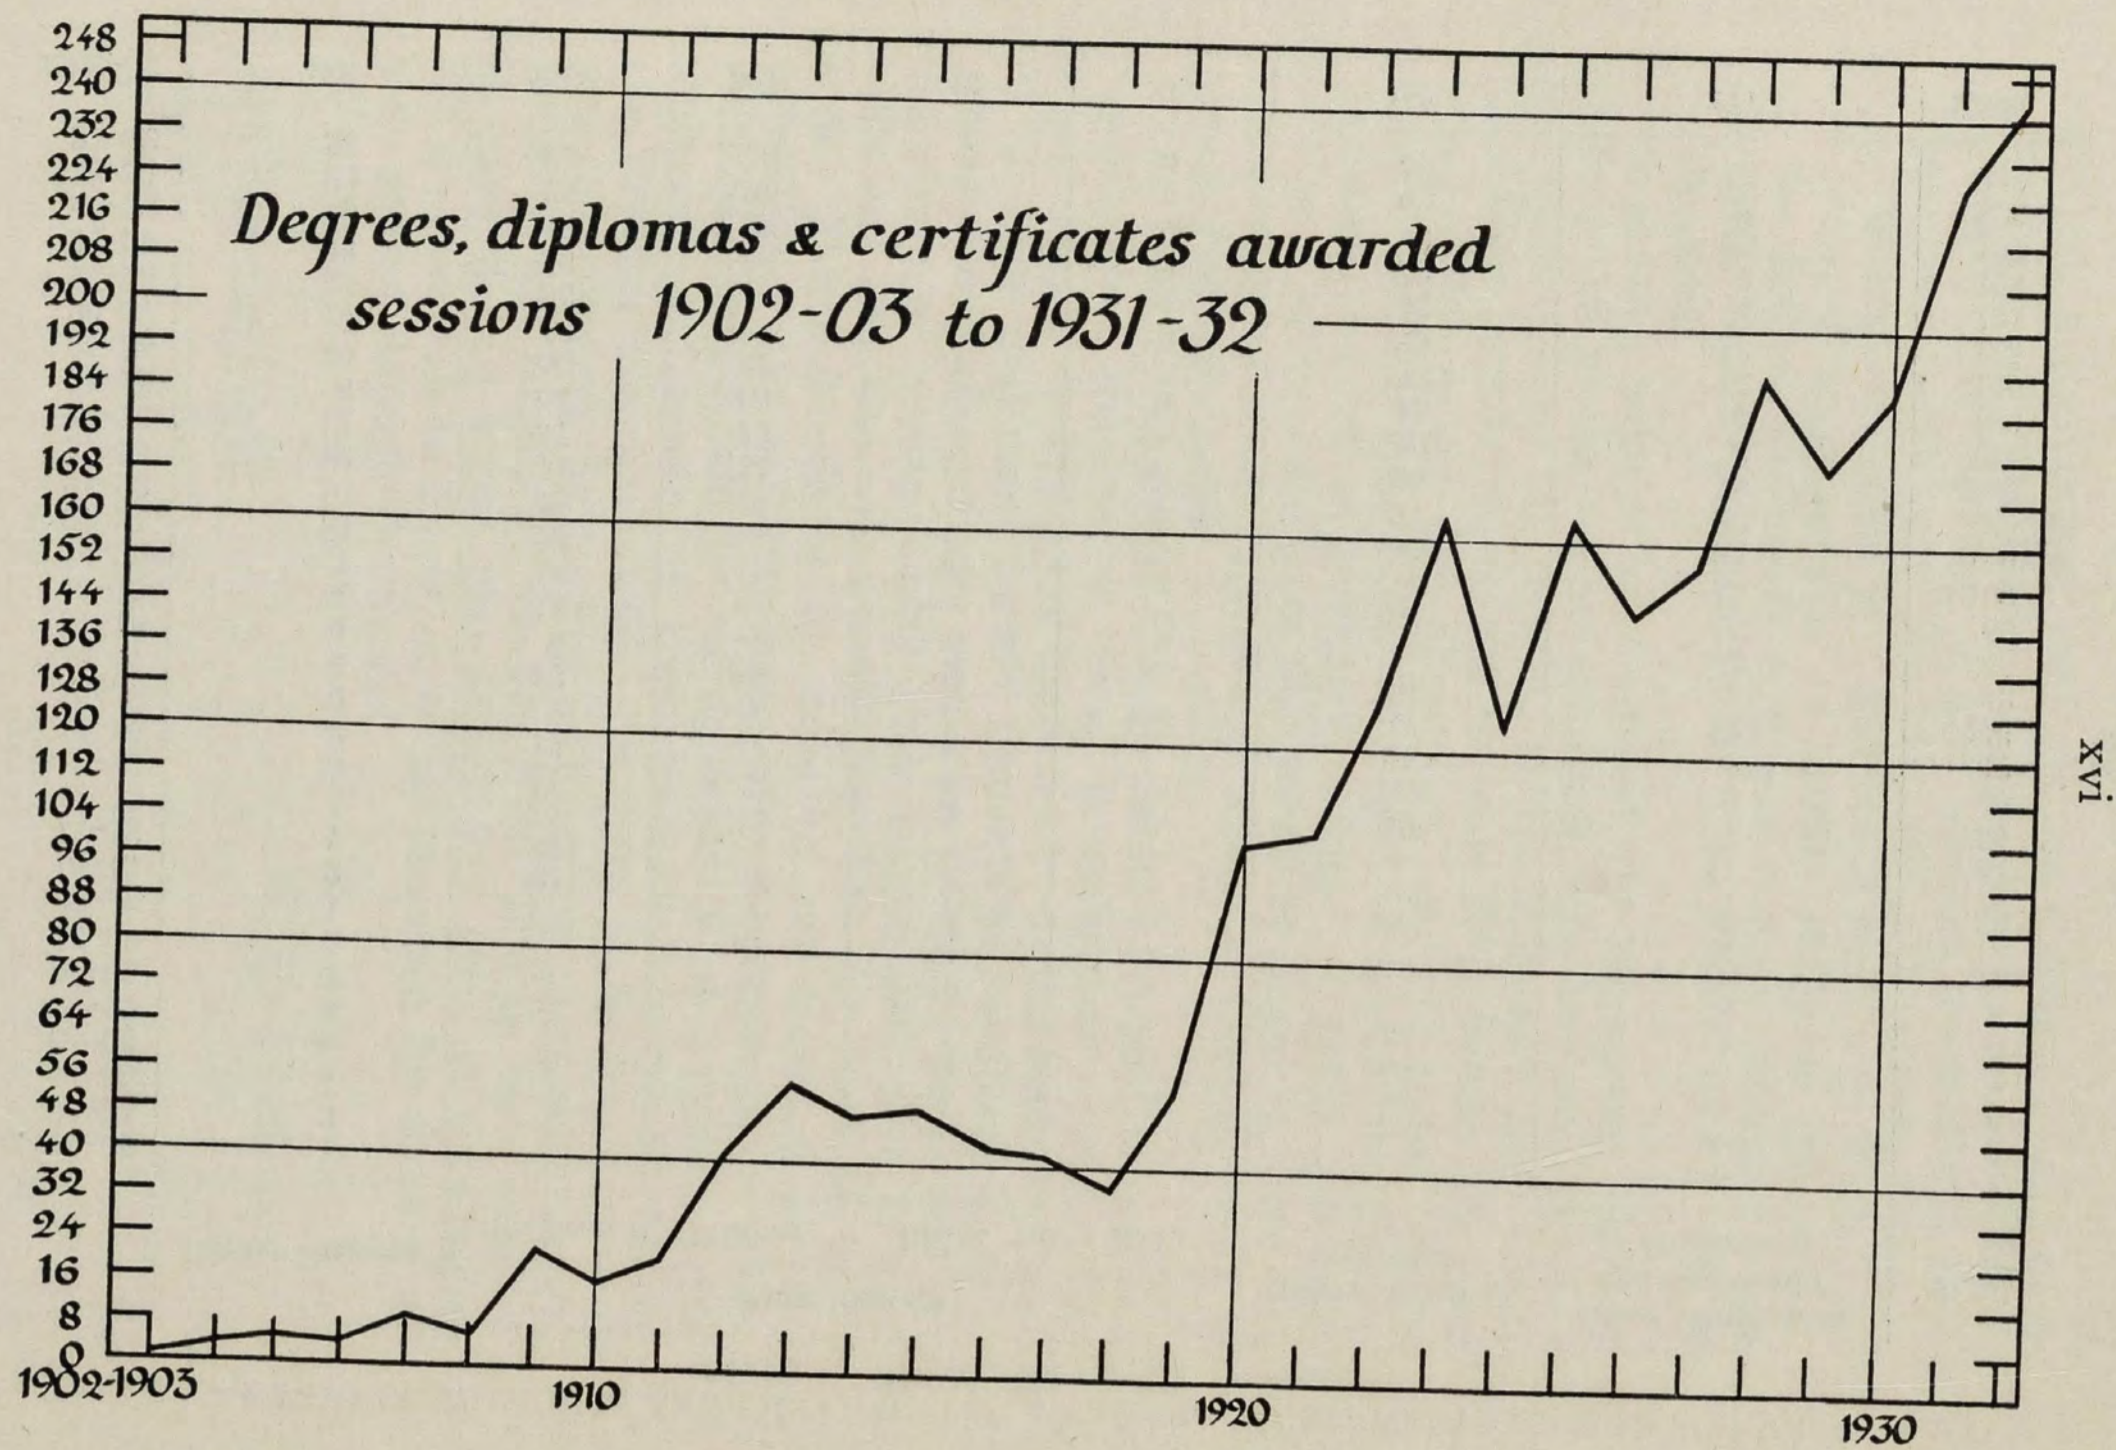

The primary object of the Register, however, is not the furnishing of material of social investigation or even the illustration of the history of the School. It has been compiled in the hope that many former students will welcome it, as a means of recalling their memories of the School and of refreshing or re-establishing their connections with it and with one another. Its compilation has not been an easy task. There should be no need to ask leniency for its inevitable errors and omissions. In supplements or later editions there should be an opportunity of repairing both omissions and errors. I hope that all into whose hands the Register comes, and who can help to its improvement and completeness, by sending addresses of those with whom we have lost touch, by sending from time to time supplementary details about themselves, will give us that help. We do not wish to forget or to be forgotten by those who have passed through the School.

APPENDIX F.

TEACHERS OF THE SCHOOL SINCE 1895.

The table of teachers, in accordance with modern practice, is divided into those on the staff of the School (including Professors, Readers, Lecturers, Assistants and other junior grades) and "other lecturers". The distinction between the two groups is not in the earlier time absolutely clear. Very few of those who taught at the School before the war had either full-time or pensionable posts. On the other hand a number of those who since the war appear as "occasional" or "other" lecturers in fact have continued for many years in that capacity. Equally the distinction now made between those who are normally members of the Professorial Council (as Professors, Readers, or Lecturers) and the junior teachers does not apply precisely to the earlier time.
