Notes and News.

Women and the Welsh Home Rule Movement.
We note with interest that the Welsh National Conference on Home Rule or Self-Government for Wales, which was held last week at Llandrindod Wells, elected three women on to the Executive Committee formed to draft a Welsh Nationalist programme. Among these women is Mrs. Coombe Tennars, of Cadoxton, an exceedingly active member of the N.U.W.S.S. and formerly a member of the Executive Committee. The others are Lady Boston, of Anglesea, and Mrs. Herbert Lewis of Cardiff. It seems probable that the work of the Committee will be the chief factor in deciding what kind of call be the chief factor in deciding what kind of self-government Wales demands, and is likely to affect public affairs beyond the area of the Principality. The Western Mail (a Conservative paper) has pointed out that if a federal system of Home Rule brought forward by the Government for Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, there will probably be a large measure of uniformity for all the areas. The Welsh Home Rule movement has done well to elect Women on to its Executive Committee, and we hope it will continue to urge a sound point of view about the political relations of women and men in the future.

Married Women and British Nationality Laws.

The British Nationality and Status of Aliens Bill, just introduced by the Home Secretary, proposes further to restrict the very meagre nationality rights of British married women. While it deals mainly with the denaturalisation of aliens, its title is so wide that it is possible to amend it so as to restore to women the right lost by them, in 1870, of retaining their British nationality on marriage with an alien. Amendments are to be moved, which seek to restore this right, and which give to married women the same right to choose their nationality as men. It is important that all women's societies should send resolutions to their Members of Parliament urging them to vote for the Amendment of the Bill in this sense.

Claim Your Vote.

Continual questions are being raised as to how the Representation of the People Act affects the daughter resident in her parents' house. Her position is really perfectly clear. She can qualify for both the Parliamentary and Local Government votes if, during the necessary six months—i.e., from last October 15th she has paid rent for her room and owned the furniture which it contains, the only difference being that, in the first case, her age must be thirty or over, in the second twenty-one or over. Many registration officers are, it is true, refusing to admit her right to register. The daughter at home should, however, insist on claiming the Parliamentary and Local votes. The position of these registration officers is quite untenable. Before the passing of this year's Act, men had the Parliamentary and Local votes on a lodger qualification, and the fact of lodging in a parents' house was universally recognised as a qualification for the vote. That was only right—it is only right. Therefore, in the face of rebuff, the lodger-daughter must preserve an undaunted spirit-and claim!

Although the date for publication of the new Electors' Lists has been postponed from June 15th to June 29th, it is not proposed to alter the date, October 1st, on which the register comes into force. The dates as now fixed are as follows:—Publication of Electors' Lists, June 29th.
Last day for objections to Electors' Lists, July 10th. Last day for claims, July 17th.
Publication of objections to Electors' Lists, July 19th. Publication of list of claimants, July 25th.
Last day for objections to claimants, July 31st. Publication of objections to claimants (as soon as practicable

Miss Macarthur's Candidature.

The Press has been full of Miss Mary Macarthur's Parliamentary candidature, and it is most encouraging to see how friendly an attitude is generally adopted. She is conhow friendly an attitude is generally adopted. She is congratulated and encouraged, her chances of success are widely discussed, but nowhere is she opposed, nor is any clamour raised by outraged reactionaries. Miss Macarthur's position is distinct from other women candidates who have come forward so far. Mrs. Philip Snowden and Miss Bondfield have been adopted as candidates by the Independent Labour Party, but Miss Macarthur is a step ahead. She has not only been adopted by the Labour Party, but has been accepted by a constituency, and will contest as Labour candidate the next election at Stourbridge.

Exhibition of Women's Work.

The Exhibition of Women's Work, which is being held under the ægis of the Ministry of Munitions, at the Whitechapel Art Gallery, is most interesting and instructive. It can leave no doubt in the mind of the most sceptical as to the suitability of women for the more skilled branches of engineering. It is true that most of the work exhibited was done under male supervision; but no amount of supervision could be responsible for the precision of workmanship displayed in the specimens shown. Particularly noticeable are the samples of glass blowing and grinding; throat sprays of the most delicate manufacture; X-ray tubes of a highly complex nature; and optical instruments, such as lenses, range-finders, dial sights, periscopes, on which it would only be possible to employ the most carefully trained and skilled male or female labour. Most of true that most of the work exhibited was done under male carefully-trained and skilled male or female labour. the surgical glass instruments, such as the X-ray tubes, were made on the Continent before the war, and in consequence of this there has been a serious shortage until quite recently. But the industry is now in full swing in North London, and this is largely due to the help given by work. A very hopeful view of the future of women's work is taken by a works manager and engineer of women's work is taken by a works manager and engineer of many years' standing, whom we met at the opening of the Exhibition. In his opinion women's labour in the mechanical trade has come to stay. There will, he thinks, be plenty of work after the war for both the skilled engineer and the women who are now engaged on skilled Great work! State work!—willingly done and well, For the men who are doing so much for us—Ay—more than words can tell!

Right work! White work! faithfully, skilfully done, But the whole of the soul of it will not be known Till the war is properly won.

They mend the men; they tend the men; They help them carry on; They drop a little veil upon The woes they've undergone.

They feed the men; they speed the men; They make their daily bread; They mend them while they're living, And they tend them when they're dead.

There's many a lonely man out there They've saved from black despair; There's many a lonely grave out there Made gracious by their care.

They toil for them; they moil for them;

Help lame dogs over stiles,
And do their best to buck them up
With cheery words and smiles.
They're just a little bit of home,

They're just a little bit of home, Come out to lend a hand, They're gleams of warm bright sunshine, In a dreary, weary land.

New work, true work, gallantly, patiently done, For the men who are giving their all for us,— Your brother, your lover, your son. High work! Thy work! if truly to Thee it's done— But we never shall know all the debt we owe Till the war is really won.

JOHN OXENHAM.

You really do care!

We know that the sympathy of every woman goes out to the hosts of girls who have left the comfort of their homes to help the nation in her hour of need.

We know also that a woman will always give practical effect to her sympathy if the opportunity is given to her to do so.

Here is a case where we can without any hesitation ask you to give liberally and now.

THE Y.W.C.A. are erecting a hut on Salisbury Plain, to provide rest, comfort, and recreation for the hundreds of W.A.A.C. girls recently drafted into that district for important and urgent military work.

This hut is known as the "Common Cause" Hut, and the Editor of this paper has undertaken to ask her readers to provide the whole cost. Her appeal has already been answered to the extent of £600, but £150 is still needed to complete the £750 needed.

Will you give something now to help clear off this balance?

The Rights of Youth.

There may seem to be a certain tragic irony in talking of the rights of youth at a time when the one outstanding right that is granted to youth by the community is the right to die. It is nevertheless a fact that these years in which the best youth of Europe has been sacrificed in war have seen the beginning of a fresh awakening to the Rights of Youth. The sacrifice could not be borne if it were not made for the sake of the future. Great numbers of the young people of to-day have given up the joy of their own youth in order to make a better world for the generations to come, and it is up to the community which accepts the sacrifice to set to work at once to build up the new life. People are beginning to realise this, and although the awakening is slow, and it is hard for us to break through the tolerance of bad conditions in which too many of us have been bred, there does seem to be more hope of constructing a world into which it will be worth while for children to be born than was apparent five years ago.

One symptom of the awakening is Mr. Fisher's Education Bill; another is the growing influence of the Workers' Educational Association. The W.E.A., as most readers of The Common Cause know, was founded about fifteen years ago by a small group of working men and scholars, who felt that the ideals of democracy and of education had much in common, and that the cause of education ought to be pressed forward by those who agreed in believing it to be the right of every citizen and in caring for it, for itself. The W.E.A. is not a party association, it takes no direct part in politics, but from one point of view it may be regarded as the educational side of the British Labour Movement, and its existence is a standing refutation of the charge that the organised labour of this country does not care for education.

The attitude of the Labour Party towards Mr. Fisher's Bill was made plain by Mr. Henderson at a very interesting conference, at which he took the Chair last Saturday. The Conference, which was organised by the London District Branch of the W.E.A., had for its title "the Rights of Youth," and the speakers, Mr. Henderson, Professor Adams, Miss Alice Wood and Mr. Ammon dealt with several entirely distinct aspects of this large subject. Mr. Henderson and Mr. Ammon, who is chairman of the Fawcett Association (the Postal Sorters' trade union) both spoke of its political aspect. Mr. Henderson said that Labour accepts Mr. Fisher's Bill, not as a final or perfect measure, but as an instalment of justice. They accept it, in fact, very much in the same spirit in which they accepted the Representation of the People Bill. They regard the provisions for the continued education of young people as quite insufficient, but as an effort in the right direction which it is all-important to support.

Professor Adams made an interesting and suggestive speech-on the psychology of adolescence. But to a suffragist perhaps the most interesting thing in the conference was the insistence of all the speakers on the need for equality of opportunity for both sexes. Mr. Henderson is so true a eminist that he rarely makes a speech on any subject without pressing this need. On this occasion he went straight to it, beginning his speech by saying that the education of the future depended to a very great extent on the supply of teachers, and that it was quite useless to hope that this could be adequate till the position of the women teachers, and the principle of equal pay for equal work were established. Miss Alice Wood dwelt specially on the needs of girls in continuation schools. She said that the girls of a generation back were struggling for the right to work, but that the modern girl demanded something more, 'a full life, including work.' She also said that a recent enquiry among village mothers had revealed that many of these mothers were really anxious that their boys and girls should be taught the same things, and given equal opportunities of learning sewing and carpentering as well as more intellectual subjects

This statement of Miss Wood's was interesting, because it raised, by implication, a question which was afterwards brought forward by representatives of the London Adult Schools Union, namely what is the present attitude of the average working-class parent towards continued education? It is obviously a calumny to say that organised labour does not care about education, just as it is a calumny to say that organised education does not care for the working man's child. But there does seem to be reason to fear that ordinary men and women, whether they belong to the working class or the employing class, are inclined to be frightened at the claims of education, and are not yet sufficiently awake to the Rights of Youth. It is among these ordinary, unawakened people that propaganda must be done; and the amount of sympathy accorded to their doubts must depend on whether these spring from real agonising anxiety about the welfare of the children themselves, such as that which Miss Anna Martin, in the articles recently published in our columns, ascribes to the working-class mother; or from a survival of the old false belief that it is necessary for the country that half its children should be regarded as the instruments of industry, instead of as an end in themselves. We have here only space to suggest that the former objection might be met by some form of endowment of motherhood, or by maintenance grants for children of school age, while the latter ought to be swept away as a remnant of a false civilisation, unworthy of a generation which has shown itself ready to perish for freedom, and which, in doing so, has opened its eyes to perceive, though at first a little dimly, the inalienable Rights of Youth.

Medicine for Women.

By C. W. SALEEBY, M.D., F.R.S. EDIN.

Students of the medical profession and its national functions must feel the utmost alarm at the prospect for the coming years, which is not threatened but positively assured. The steady decline, during several years before the war, in the numbers of those offering themselves for this indispensable profession has led up to the present period of unprecedented demand, aggravated to-day by a recruiting policy, as regards medical students, early in the war, of which the best and worst that could be said was that it was consistent with the national attitude towards all other forms of education and of science—or, in our tongue, knowledge—since the war began.

increasingly until to-day, I have believed in and advocated the medical woman; but the best that could be said for her in the past is entirely beggared by the present case. To-day it is simply impossible to find medical women to meet the demand. The public and, not least, the Child of Life, are paying the price for the pitiful past hostility of male members of the medical woman; but the best that could be said for her in the past is entirely beggared by the present case. To-day it is simply impossible to find medical women to meet the demand. The public and, not least, the Child of Life, are paying the price for the pitiful past hostility of male members of the medical profession, in the palpable interests of the Calf of Gold, to which, however, no clause in the Hippocratic Oath is dedicated. Recent perversions of feminism, rooted in sex antagonism, have exacerbated or reawakened this prejudice in many cases, not least in the public letter of a famous

For many years to come, the national need of the medical service will be as great as, or greater than, that of to-daywhich is like nothing in the records of the profession. What I have called the "longest price of war," its dysgenic destruction of so many of the healthiest, entails a marked reduction in the average health of the present population, and a lower standard of health in the nfants who will, for many years to come, be born of, on the average, physically inferior fathers. For many years our land will be crowded with brave men broken for freedom, and needing far more than the average amount of medical attention. The cost of living will involve further calls upon the medical profession. The dreadful chronic disease, tuberculosis, which, hough mercifully not a racial poison, is the chief cause of validism and death among adults, is now rapidly increasing, chiefly among women, in its pulmonary form, owing, probably, to their much increased exposure to infection in industry; and also among children, in its abdominal form, owing to increased infection from our rapidly deteriorating milk supply. It is tragic to contemplate the immensity of the nedical need which, for many years to come, will flow from this one source-a disease which, before the war, was in the way of being conquered altogether. For, if we housed ourselves and our cows properly, and isolated present infectious cases, there would be no more tuberculosis. And, further, the present and prospective increase of venereal disease, and most otably of gonorrhœa amongst women, means a greatly ncreased demand for gynæcological skill, this disease being, for instance, the cause of at least half the abdominal operations performed in past years upon women; whilst syphilis, the child nurderer and maimer, will see to it that there are hosts of neurable children in years to come, continually needing medical skill for their relief. That is the prospect; and whilst many doctors have been killed in the war, the numbers of young nedical students offer no possibility of meeting the coming need The numbers who can, by any possibility, qualify in the next ew years, are totally inadequate, nor do we know when the formal numbers of school boys will be available to pass to the

There is only one remedy, and that, fortunately, an evident and entirely adequate one. In December, 1915, I wrote an article in The Westminster Gazette, asking for its immediate application. I wrote that article, as I write this, to commend the claims of Medicine for Women; but I did not know then how great the need would be—that men like my honoured friend, Sir Victor Horsley, noble enemy of alcohol and champion of women, and of scientific research in medicine, would soon be giving their lives, apparently in vain, whilst the senile-puerile men called "statesmen" and "generals" in those years, blundered, and that, two and a half years later, the Army would be asking for doctors up to the age of fifty-six, whilst the civilian population, including the mothers and children, who are the national future for which we are fighting, are to be attended by—whom?

As a first-year medical student, curiously sitting in the physics class behind the rows reserved for the women, and medical woman; but the best that could be said for her in the past is entirely beggared by the present case. To-day it is simply impossible to find medical women to meet the demand. The public and, not least, the Child of Life, are paying the price for the pitiful past hostility of male members of the medical profession, in the palpable interests of the Calf of Gold, to which, however, no clause in the Hippocratic Oath is dedicated. Recent perversions of feminism, rooted in sex antagonism, have exacerbated or reawakened this prejudice in many cases, not least in the public letter of a famous bacteriologist, but deplorable sociologist, now better engaged in invaluable services to our troops, who infamously denied the attribute of modesty to any medical woman. And only the other day, in a provincial town where I had been asked to speak on behalf of infancy, I found that the medical men had conspired to oust from the post for which she had specially qualified herself a medical woman serving in the baby-clinic, and to substitute for her a man who had made no study of the subject. (Only one school of medicine in these islands-it is in Ireland-requires any study of the infant and its disorders from its graduands. When I first qualified, after five assiduous years in Edinburgh, I merely knew one end of a baby from the other.) In some schools -no wonder-the numbers of women entering had declined in pre-war years, like the numbers of men. But the time had come

Nothing could be more certain than the professional prospects of any competent medical woman in the coming years. No parents could do better for an intelligent daughter than enter her for the profession. In fact, we must have the women if we are to have doctors at all; but I urge that we want the women, not faute de mieux, but for choice. I say nothing here of surgery, in which, nevertheless, many women excel. But in general clinical medicine, in obstetrics and gynæcology, and in the care of infants and children, women have sexual qualifications which often make them preferable to men on every score. The greater part of general medical practice is among women and children, and who but a woman should serve them best? And if the conditions of general practice are found too arduous for some women who qualify, never was there such a demand for them in posts, the number of which increases daily—as school doctors and doctors for infant and maternity welfare centres. Soon we shall expose to such deserved and unendurable public obloquy every corner of our land which habitually kills the infants there born, without an effort to save them, that, under the provisions of the Notification of Births (Extension) Act, and the coming Ministry of Health, we shall everywhere have medical officers devoted to what I call Saving the Future; and the majority of such officers will be, as they should be, women. The need and demand for medical women, and their professional status and emoluments, will most surely increase as the years go on, when every mother and every child in our land will be reckoned as priceless national possessions, the first charges upon the knowledge and devotion of their time, and when the natural qualifications of women in their service will be universally acknowledged.

Recently the Duchess of Marlborough and some other wise feminists, who can serve women without finding it necessary to hate men, and consequently arouse their hate, made a splendid attempt to raise funds in aid of the teaching of medical women in London. I am trying here to show that, even from the most grossly financial point of view, the education of women for medicine is as sound an investment as can be named, alike for the individual herself and for the nation. On every ground, therefore, as a public practitioner, I now prescribe Medicine for Women.

If expense be a serious obstacle, as, indeed, it has long been, in the case of many well-fitted youths, generous, wise, and wealthy women and men must make the way easier for the suitable by an establishment of such an "educational ladder" as opens the door of the profession to any bright and serious boy in Scotland-where knowledge is honoured. Nor must it be supposed that such education can lead only to ordinary medical practice—the so-called doctoring which is not doctoring at all, but drugging. The profession is evolving. Qualified women will be increasingly wanted for real doctoring, which is not "doping," but teaching the public. Wherever young women are assembled, not merely at puberty but throughout adolescence, whether as "Waacs," or "Wrens," or "Penguins," munition workers in war, or in the industries of peace, they will have, in coming years, what they have always needed but never had, the counsel and direction of trained members of their own sex, to teach them the art of livingdifficult enough for men, and yet more difficult, in similar and diverse ways, for women. I do not mean that men should not lecture to women-I lecture continually myself to audiences of even young women, than whom none are quicker to follow and consider—nor that medical women should not lecture to audiences of men, for it is high time that they did; but evidently there can be no sphere more natural, more deeply maternal, more useful than that of the medical women who guides and guards her juniors in the maze of our modern world.

And then there is research. In these recent years, men have learnt, near and far, how admirable woman may be in the laboratory. She is not perpetually stupefying herself with the supposed "stimulant" which men use so largely to narcotise their sensations of fatigue or boredom; she is not for ever interrupting her work to light her pipe, she is conscientious, devoted, clean in her technique, neat with her fingers, careful in her records. To-day the reports of contemporary research teem with the names and the invaluable work of women. Our newest knowledge of the "accessory factors" of diet, the lack of which causes scurvy and rickets and beri-beri, is due entirely to two women, who are now at work on the effects of long storage, cold storage, &c., on the food for our fighting forces. And the demand for suitable persons to fill posts, both in research laboratories and in the pathological laboratories which are everywhere needed and will be set up under the coming health administration, will increase for many years to come.

therefore to the common cause of humanism, which is being, and will be, increasingly derived from the existence of a large and influential number of medical women. All true faiths especially in their youth, like other living things-are liable to infection by faddisms, fanaticisms, and falsities, which may do them and the community grave injury. Feminism is certainly no exception. Inevitably it attaches to itself not only the sane and kindly of both sexes, but many of the abnormal, disappointed, sex-antagonised, epicene, suspicious, bitter, and those whose hand is against every man's. This cannot be helped. The antidote is knowledge. Let there be ever more and more women in whom the trained head is the pilot and searchlight for the womanly heart. Such women in the medical profession are priceless. One could mention numbers, but perhaps I may instance, without offence, Dr. Mary Scharlieb, C.B.E., and Lady Barrett, C.B.E. In such matters as the control of venereal disease and the encouragement of the research which gives us power to save the body-and through it (may I incidentally reply to Mrs. Osler), often and often, the soul, for which everything exists, and compared with which the entire physical universe is but dust in the balance—the work and advocacy of these medical women is priceless. In matters of truth their first-hand knowledge, and their sex, will save the day. I pay tribute now to Dr. Alice Corthorn, who, some years ago, did great service to truth by simply stating, in public, how she had fought plague in India by a method which she had repeatedly used upon herself to encourage others. Such testimony from women is priceless in certain crucial cases. Happy are the humane sciences of the future, in that they will have many such women as their

There is going to be a lamentable defect of men in our national sex-constitution in the decades ahead. A larger number of women than ever cannot become mothers under our monogamous marriage system. For many such the deepest and highest instinct of their nature, the love and succour of the helpless, can be satisfied through the medical profession, wherein they may follow that foster-mother indeed, Florence Nightingale, whom the male doctors of her time decried, but whom the modern hygienist recognises as not only the "lady with a Lamp," whose shadow on the wall the dying soldiers kissed, but as also one of the great reformers and creators of Lastly, may I urge the immense advantage to feminism, and National Medicine, which is the medicine of the future.

Women's Service in France.

Service Bureau in London, there is particular fascination in the knowledge that the same work is being carried on in the same way, and by almost identical methods, in Paris.

During a recent visit I had the privilege of visiting the two offices that deal with the voluntary enlistment of French women, and by the kindness of their Secretaries. I was able to study in detail the methods and results of their work. The two offices, one in the Rue d'Ulm and the other in the Rue de l'Arcade, work in co-operation, the first being run by an independent Committee, and the second being part of the work of the Conseil National des Femmes Françaises (which is the French N.U.W.W.). The first bureau, l'Association pour l'Enrôlement Volontaire des Françaises, which was founded in March, 1917, is housed in the Ecole Normal, in a long, light room divided by a large number of partitions, and the work is so organised that applicants passing from one cubicle to another receive attention and information in the most concise and businesslike manner. The Bureau places women chiefly in Government offices, munition factories, and hospitals, but deals also with new occupations for women, in so far as these are developing in France. By the kindness of its Secretary, Madame Borel, I had an opportunity to see its work in detail, and was greatly impressed by the efficiency of the organisation, and the enthusiasm and capacity of the women who carry on its work. The records, the card index system, communications with Government Departments, negotiations with employers, the medical and clerical examinations held by the Bureau, and the whole system of correspondence and of interviews tallies almost exactly with that carried out at 58, Victoria Street; the main difference being that the French Association is subsidised by the Ministry of Munitions and the War Office as well as by private donations, and that its main effort is directed

To one like myself, interested in the work of the Women's | towards filling posts, while its English equivalent, without a Government subsidy, is more free to criticise the arrangements made for the employment of women, and more constantly active for the improvement of their conditions and wages.

The other Bureau, l'Office Central de l'Activité Féminine, 15, Rue de l'Arcade, is lodged in a shop on the ground floor and works on similar lines. I had the privilege of spending two afternoons in this office, and of watching the whole procedure in respect of applicants who came in, from their first period of waiting on the bench by the door, through their interview with a kindly and well-informed interviewer, to the moment when their cards and numbers were indexed and filed, and suitable openings were collected and presented to them. In this office I was greatly struck by the friendliness both of interviewers and applicants and by the traditional politeness of French people. Here, too, subsidies are received from the Government, and the systematic criticism of those in authority, which is such a universal part of English political life, was noticeably absent. In both Bureaux, however, it was clear that, though the method was perhaps less aggressive than ours, the aim of these French organisations was the same, mainly to give to women the fullest opportunity to serve their country, and to help their country to get the fullest advantage from their service.

I brought home with me from Paris the Annual Reports, the official papers, and the posters of both these Women's Service Bureaux, and they are displayed with great satisfaction in the London office. I brought home also the knowledge that in Paris, as in London, the needs of women are the same, the need for their organisation and their continued effort is the same, and the problems that face them, though they differ in degree and in emphasis, are fundamentally the same problems.

I find it impossible to conclude these notes without referring to the appeal for funds just being sent out by the London Society for Women's Suffrage, on the occasion of the development of its work which the passing of the Representation of the People Act and the extension of the objects of the Union make possible. The war work of the Society now, by a readjustment of organisation and a considerable extension of its scope, becomes part of its regular activity. It thus has a double claim upon its supporters. I believe it to be of the first importance that work such as this should be carried on by those who believe in the fullest possible development of women's

In Miss G. B. Stern's A Marrying Man there is a discussion doubts and propound further questions. To ask whether it is worth while " to write novels in war-time is to assume that, at other times, and as a general rule, people write novels because it is worth while, and do not write novels unless it is worth while. For my part, I suspect that people write novels because they can't help writing novels. We all admit this imperative impulse as the origin and cause of the greatest art.

Why should we doubt it in the case of any art? And as for writing novels about the war-there seems so often, in discussions of that matter, to be the implication that very good novels can in some sort of way "express" the war, and are therefore justified, while the less good cannot express anything so vast, and are therefore impossible to justify. But one has to give a very odd meaning to the word "express" before one can argue that any novel, however good, could "express" so omnipresent a calamity as the war. The multiplicity, the immensity, stun the sense. To attempt the impossible task of "crowding everything in" would be destructive of art. But the key is in the word "multiplicity." Each single tragedy in the war is a single tragedy, like each single tragedy before the war: and art which interprets and illuminates one incident does in a way interpret and illuminate all. It is at the multiplicity that the sense wavers or goes numb. Before the war there were in this country alone, on an average, two hundred thousand "industrial casualties" every year: but we did not read about them each morning in the newspapers, and most of us simply did not realise them. Now we are surrounded by something that we have all got to realise. But, realising it, we can also from that realisation go on to a realisation of even the tragedies we did not realise before, and see the history of the world as the accumulation of individual efforts, sufferings, alleviations, and joys. The function of poetry, it and if that is true of poetry it is true of novels. To fulfil that function in connection with the sorrows of the war, a poem or a novel need not be about the war in the narrow sense at all.

Any art which harmonises, which illuminates, any sorrow.

does the same for the whole company of sorrows. Critics who expound Shakespeare and Sophocles tell us of what they call the "solution" at the end of a great tragedy: it is their word for that feeling of peace which supervenes upon the noble (I would say, the religious) treatment of even the most intolerable wrong and the bitterest suffering. Aristotle taught that the function of tragedy was to accomplish the purgation of such emotions as pity and fear, not by the suppression, but by the exercise of those emotions. The case put before us in tragedy, the tragic case, arouses emotion because it is correlated, in the artist's perception and in ours, to the ultimate and universal truths. One case is more than one case, because it may be the type or summary of all. Before we discuss whether, and how, the writers in our own day ought to write "about" the war, it is worth while to consider the example of writers in other days. In the year of the great Armada Shakespeare was young man on the threshold of his career: he wrote about the Armada not one line. He seems to have sought the effect of vastness in his great plays by seeking, first, remotenessremoteness generally in time, but sometimes in place: for with the writing, is set at the far end of Europe, and its hero

Women War Novelists.

By GERALD GOULD.

The anthropophagi, and men whose heads
Do grow beneath their shoulders." among the characters as to whether it is "worth while" to go on writing novels during the war. That, and the cognate When Shakespeare wanted, as in Antony and Cleopatra, to questions of how far it is possible, and how far, if possible, it is justifiable, to write novels "about" the war, have been disshow the world divided into two hostile camps, and the clash cussed many hundreds of times, and always the questions have been left unanswered and the attempted answers have been left suspended, as it were, in mid-air. For such questions beg themselves. They cannot be tackled except on the basis of assumptions which, as the discussion proceeds, raise their own of world-wide armies, he showed it indirectly, as a thing too vast and terrible for direct contemplation: as the Medusa head could be looked at only in a mirror, he showed the world at war in the image of a man who threw away the empire of the world, and victory in war, for something else. But possibly Shakespeare would have written about the Armada if the war with Spain had changed the daily life of every home At any rate, in the changed conditions of our modern world our ways of living having changed so much that our ways of thinking must have changed too, and "remoteness" having been rendered almost impossible by the growth of scientific invention—there is no reason why the artist should leave aside the subject which is closest to all hearts and minds. The reading public does certainly extend a welcome to novels which recall the pre-war placidities, and thus offer a temporary refuge from the prevailing oppression: but it would not be natural for such books to exceed in popularity the novels that are "about" the war. And, as our analysis has implied, there are two main ways of being "about" the war. The novelist can take an individual life and show how the impact of war affected that: or she can (I say "she," because it is only of women novelists that I am writing—the same applies equally, of course, to the men novelists) attempt a panoramic view of the change that has come over whole "sets," whole classes of people, whole kinds of life. One might have expected Mrs. Humphry Ward, always an ambitious writer with a taste for large "canvasses," to take the panoramic view: but, in fact, her war-novel was a simple and "individual" story, and, at that, thoroughly successful. The two books that, among the work of women-novelists, most immediately occur to one's mind as examples of the "panoramic" method are Miss May Sinclair's The Tree of Heaven, which fails to give a general view only because of the special hardness of its author's intellectual brilliance, and Mrs. Hamilton's Dead Yesterday, a book of wonderful range and vivid interest, though limited because it applies only to a particular "set" which never, I think, had the prevalence or the importance Mrs. Hamilton attributed to it. Of the other, the "individual" kind, the aesthetic test is-does the war "come in" as it did come in, or is it dragged in as an illegitimate cutting-short of difficulties? High among the books whose introduction of the war is artistically legitimate because it is artistically inevitable (the only test of legitimacy) must come Miss Stella Benson's This is the End, with its whimsical wit and extraordinary poignancy. Also (already referred to) Miss Stern's A Marrying Man. Miss Clemence Dane's First the Blade is extremely clever, but one feels that in it the war plays a part which might as easily and successfully have been played by something else. That is by no means an adverse criticism of the novel as a novel, but it prevents one from regarding it as primarily or specifically a war novel. Such a book, again, as Miss E. M. Delafield's The War Workers, an amusing and cutting satire, faithful in its presentation of detail, and representative "in little" of the problem dealt with "in large" by Meredith in The Egoist, and by Miss Anne Douglas Sedgwick in Valerie Ipton-such a book, too, though all its externals are connected with the war, would lose nothing in a different setting.

Let me turn aside from women novelists, one moment, for a contrast. Le Feu, by Henri Barbusse, is surely the greatest war book since Tolstoy's War and Peace. To it there is, as far as I know, no English counterpart. Mr. Hugh Walpole's The Dark Forest, perhaps, comes nearest, though I am conscious in saying this—and, indeed, in writing this article at all—of the disability of having left some of the best-known English war novels, whether by men or by women, unreadpartly because some of them are only just out! In this war, vomen, like men, have written of their actual experiences under fire: but even in this war women have, of course, had little chance, compared with men, of recording that side of war's experience. Yet nobody nowadays-and the recognition of obvious fact is a great gain—pretends that the women's part has less of suffering. If no single English book, by either woman or man, has succeeded in giving that effect of terrific summary, of comprehensiveness, achieved by Tolstoy and Barbusse, that is no reflection on the quality or importance of what has been achieved. In many and many a book we have been given a type (and a type is, after all, in its way a summary) which, by the sincerity of its feeling and the beauty of its presentment, has performed the artist's task—the task of introducing into the apparent wilderness of tragic human experience some hint of divine meaning, and so "harmonising the sorrow of the world." A MINISTRY OF HEALTH. By Major J. W. Hills, M.P. (Published by The Women's Local Government Society, 19, Tothill-street, Westminster, S.W. 1. Price 4d.)

The Women's Local Government Society has just published in pamphlet form an address delivered by Major J. W. Hill, M.P., at its Annual Public Meeting, in March of this year, on the need for a Ministry of Health.

The pamphlet is a most useful one, and combines interest with utility. It deals first with pre-war conditions, showing how, before the war, the control of public health was divided among a multitude of authorities—the divisions not only being irrational but frequently indistinct, so that the functions of independent bodies were perpetually found to overlap, and frequently to impede one another. Major Hill then goes on to analyse the effects of the war upon public health. War, in the first place, has by the intensification of strain, and by the aggregation of workers in already congested industrial districts, increased the proportion of ill-health in the country. Secondly, it has resulted in the establishment of many new Government Departments, which have gradually been forced interfere in health control, so that the supervision of public health is yet more subdivided than previously.

Increase in health, and increase in the number of authorities concerned with health, have made the deficiencies of our health system glaringly apparent. The result is an almost unanimous opinion in favour of a unified system of health

Major Hill discusses the form which this system shall take; the alternatives are to construct a new Government Department or to reorganise one which is already in existence. He pronounces in favour of adaption, and after weighing the merits of the Insurance Commission and the Local Government Board, decides in favour of the latter. The pamphlet closes with a rough sketch of the main reforms which will be necessary, and the powers which it will be desirable to vest in the new Ministry of Health.

Obituary. MR. SIDNEY BALL.

With the death, on May 23rd, of Sidney Ball, Fellow and Senior Tutor of St. John's College, Oxford, all democratic causes lose a good friend. And as regards the democratic cause which most concerns the N.U.W.S.S., its members will remember him princi-pally as a life-long champion of women, both in University and in Imperial politics. Sidney Ball was not only a fearless democrat in his political and social theories, he was a democrat in the life he lived; for no type of humanity was uninteresting to him, and nobody's hopes or troubles left him unmoved. And so it was that, when Oxford lost her young men and the old hospitable life of which Sidney Ball had been the centre came to an end, the same humanity which had given him a share in the joys of many hundreds of friends, gave him also a share in their sorrows. The war hit him very hard.

There are few pioneers of thought in politics or letters throughout the world, who have not at some time in their lives visited Oxford; and there are few who, in the course of such visits, have not carried away memories of the magnificent geniality of Sidney Ball. It is possible that his passionate enthusiasm for unpopular causes cost him an academic position; but it gained him something more durable—a place in the hearts of many hundreds of the young men and women who are going to hammer out that reconstructed democracy, of which their keen friend and teacher was allowed to see only

SALARIES OF HOSPITAL SURGEONS.

Madam,—I see in the Lancet that the Elizabeth Garrett Anderson Hospital for Women is advertising for two House Surgeons, and an Obstetric Assistant, and offering a salary of 550 per annum, with board, residence and laundry. Surely a women's hospital, staffed by women, should set the example of offering a salary equal to what a medical man would take? The necessaries of life and the recreation and rest from work (so necessary during these days of stress) are as important to the woman as to the man. The future—illness, old age—all have to be faced by the woman equally with the man, and there are many women to-day who not only support themselves but have others depending on them. Suffragists have always upheld the standard of equal pay for men and women when the work is the same, and the training has cost the same.

WOMEN ON GOVERNMENT COMMITTEES

MADAM,—May I endorse all that you say in your issue of May roth—Women on Government Committees?" It is a source of constant apprise to workers to find the same names over and over again represening women on Parliamentary Committees.

The Government should have no difficulty in finding experienced women if they would take the trouble to enquire from organisations (not connected with Politics) names of suitable women experienced in special bjects. But it is apparently only through Politicians that the selections

Would it not be desirable that through your paper a list of names of women who have been for many years connected with education, child welfare, etc., should be compiled and printed with their qualifications and sent to the heads of Government Departments and to the people in the Government or House of Commons whoever they may be who make these selections. We should then see women on Committees whose qualifications would be the experience of the subject under consideration, though they would not be the wives and relations of Cabinet Ministers, or Politicians Ministers or Politicians.

THE MARGIN OF HAPPINESS. HOUSEHOLD ORGANISATION FOR WAR SERVICE.

By Thetta Quay Franks. (G. Putnam Sons).

The chief interest of these two books from the Englishwoman's point of view is the proof afforded that American women are already up against the very problems of war-time housekeeping with which we have been wrestling for three years and more. All Mrs. Franks's indictments of the waste and unbusinesslike method of her countrywoman have been applied to ourselves, and her remedies—systematic study of food values and the reform of housekeeping methods on business lines—are familiar to us as part of the propaganda which is to transform our casual system of house-hold management into an exact science.

Reports and Notices.

How the Women of New York Won their Franchise.

The Report of the New York Women's Suffrage Party for 917, including the minutes of the forty-ninth Annual Convention held last November, has just come to us from New York. It is a comprehensive document, a multiple composite report, made up of all the reports of all the officials, and of all the Committees, for special purposes and special districts, whose devoted work contributed to the remarkable victory of last November. It is specially interesting to English Suffragists, not only because of this victory, but because it covers the period of America's entry into the war, and shows what American Suffragists did when faced with the same difficulties we had to encounter in 1914, and how like ourselves they advanced hrough those difficulties to success. In November, 1916, at the Forty-eighth Annual Convention held in Albany, the New York Suffragists faced the obstacles in the way of the Cause which were peculiar to their State; the foreign population of two and a-half million, the complicated organisation necessary for dealing at once with large cities and rural populations, the danger from the over-developed party machinery and from the powerful 'interests' which wage war against political ideals. All these difficulties they were prepared to overcome, and they did overcome them. They carried a complete organisation, on political lines, into every electoral district; they enrolled over a million women, and thus knocked the foundation out of the statement that New York women did not want the vote; they canvassed the voters; they did educational work through Suffrage schools, correspondence classes, deputations to local bodies, speeches at trade-union and agricultural gatherings, mass meetings, open-air meetings, pageants, processions,fact, all the things we did in this country before 1914. They also carried out a gigantic press and advertising campaign, and published masses of Suffrage literature. Before all this energy, the obstacles set up by ignorance, self-interest, and political corruption began to fall like nine-pins. But there was one obstacle they had not counted on, and that was the arch obstacle of war. In February, relations with Germany were broken off. All was changed. Women who had laboured all their lives for the Suffrage cause suddenly saw it as a thing of secondary importance. They cared only to find some way in which they could do direct service to their country, they demanded that their powerful organisation should be offered to the State for any service the Government might require. The Executive Committee agreed and the offer was made, twenty-four pacifis members resigned; it seemed doubtful whether the Government would really use the organisation, and meanwhile Suffrage work was suspended and confusion reigned. The Suffragists were, however, undismayed; they decided to find out ways of serving their country, even if the Government appeared not to want them, and as soon as possible to continue their Suffrage work as part of the struggle for Democracy, the cause for which America had entered the war. In the early summer of 1917, when the work for the Census, the Liberty Loan, and the Red Cross campaign were over, they resumed their Suffrage propaganda and carried it out with much grinding labour through the material difficulties of a state of war. Their courage and patience was not in vain. In November, New York, the State which political prophets had foretold would be the last to adopt Women's Suffrage, defied the prophets, and declared for the enfranchisement of women by a majority of 94,000. It was a great triumph, and we understand its glory the better for this admirable report which brings before us all the painful struggles of these last years.

The British Dominions Woman Suffrage Union is holding Third (Biennial) Conference at the Caxton Hall, on June th, 5th, and 6th. The programme is of exceptional interest, s is fitting, for the occasion is auspicious. All the Dominions epresented, with the exception of South Africa, have now n women the vote, and the Conference is meeting in the ther country, in which the women are newly enfranchised.

Questions included in the programme which will be of al interest to members of the N.U.W.S.S., are ual Suffrage for the Empire," "Equal Eligibility Jomen with Men for all Offices and Employments, "Equal Pay for Equal Work, and the Endow-of Motherhood"; "Equal Parental Rights and ent of Motherhood"; "Esponsibilities," and the "Nationality of Married men." These subjects will all be discussed on Tuesday, nne 4th. On June 5th, the Moral Question, Divorce Law eform, and International Government will be dealt with, and n the following day, Women Police, and Women and the dministration of the Law.

A particularly interesting speech should be that on the of citizens in Great Britain and the Dominions to their ws in the Crown Colonies and Dependencies. The speaker full be Lord Henry Bentinck. Other speakers are Mrs. Henry awcett, Mrs. Watt (Canada), Miss Sheepshanks, Miss artney, Miss Royden, Miss Macmillan, Miss Neilans, Miss dge, and Mrs. Sydney Herring (N.S.W., Australia). Thursday evening, the Conference ends with what should be most interesting series of speeches on India. On June 2nd, Miss Royden will preach a special sermon at the City Temple connection with the Conference. It is greatly to be hoped these meetings will be well attended by members of the .U.W.S.S. in the St. Andrews Hall, Cambridge, on May 13th, under the auspices of the N.U.W.W., to consider the formation of a Cambridge Women's Citizens' Association. Mrs. Councillor Keynes Gordon, who gave a very interesting and practical address, showing the need for such an pointing out the various important topics they would have to consider. She said the association might form, as it were, a little Parliament of women. The following resolution was then of women. The following resolution was then proposed by Mrs. Heitland, seconded by Mrs. Bethune-Baker, and unanimously carried:—

"That this meeting is in favour of the forma-tion of a Cambridge Women Citizens' Associa-tion, and recommends that societies be invited to send representatives to a conference for the purpose of drafting a provisional committee."

The Cambridge W.S.A., as will be seen by the above-mentioned names, are taking a leading part in promoting the association, though they

MANCHESTER.—A General Members' Meeting of the Society was held on May 8th. Mrs. Armstrong elaborated the Report, containing the recommendations of the Committee, and gave an outline of the prospects for a successful continuation of the Society's 50 year-old work. Four other Women's Suffrage Societies were joining the Manchester Society, two still continuing their own activities, one discontinuing its local work, and one—The Men's League for Women's Suffrage—being forced, by the depletion of its younger members, to disband altogether. Our relations with the Men's League have always been very cordial, and we owe them grateful thanks for staunch support. The adoption of the Report, which deals with the work under three main heads—legislative, co-operative, and administrative—was carried unanimously. The retiring officers and committee were re-elected, and five new members added. To the newly-created post of Hon. Bureau Secretary, Mrs. Errock was appointed. The engagement of Mrs. Russell as organiser for three days a week was reported, and Mrs. Russell gave an account of MANCHESTER .- A General Members' Meeting | above-mentioned names, are taking a leading part in promoting the association, though they are leaving the actual initiative to the N.U.W.W., of which many of them are also members. They will join the association when formed, as representing one of the women's societies in the town, and it is hoped that other societies, which have hitherto not concerned themselves with women's suffrage, will be the more ready to join the association, since it is not wholly identified with the C.W.S.A. The exact scheme adopted by the C.W.S.A. will probably be a modification of scheme Y.

showing in what way the Society can help to support those which they favour. Miss Burstall, the Headmistress of the High School, spoke on behalf of the establishment of one or more Suffrage-memorial Scholarships, to which the federated Suffrage Societies in the area are being invited to contribute. The Chairman announced a gift of £200 from Miss Margaret Ashton, viz. £100 for a Wolstenholme-Elmy Scholarship and £100 for a Rachel Scott. A further gift of £100 was promised by the Chairman of the Society, Mrs. T. C. Waterhouse.

EASTBOURNE.—A very successful meeting was arranged by the Committee of the Eastbourne Society on May 7th last. In order to bring the meaning and value of the vote to the notice of the women of the industrial classes, a kinema palace was hired for the afternoon in a populous central and a "free afternoon performance for centre, and a "free afternoon performance for Women" was well advertised. The programme included an organ recital, a good film story, then a lecture by the Rev. James Marchant, F.R.S., on "The Women's Vote: What difference will it make?" The address was followed with the classest attention by an audience of pearly for it make?" The address was followed with the closest attention by an audience of nearly 600 women (probably the largest meeting of women ever held in Eastbourne). Then came the collection, then more films, topical and otherwise, concluding with "The King," and the National Anthem.

NORWICH .- During the last fortnight Miss ne Club, on the Representation of the People to There seems to be a very real interest and its springing up among women to understand it new responsibilities, as evidenced in the ny requests coming in from organised bodies women to have women's franchise fully plained to them.

DEAL AND WALMER .- Two successful meetings DEAL AND WALMER.—Two successful meetings ere held by this society on May 16th launch a Women Citizens' Association Deal, Walmer, and district. The speaker both was Miss Mercer and the chair as taken in the afternoon by Mrs. are Royse, and in the evening by W. Y. 17gess, Esq., J.P. Lord Northbourne, who oposed a vote of thanks, warned the women at they would find the political parties very not alike and advised them to think for emselves. A good number of members enrolled opinions of the political parties were memselves. A good number of members enrolled opinions of the political parties were memselves.
